Parrot:

OSAP backlogs

According to official information from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, more than 74,000 applications were received by the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) by August 27. Almost 65,000 have been processed and the results sent out to the various colleges and universities.

Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, said the high volume of processed applications now being returned to the institutions may cause a backlog in some student awards offices. "I realize that delays can be very inconvenient, but I hope students will understand that student awards officers are under a lot of pressure during registration and that some delay is unavoidable," Dr. Parrott stated.

The Ministry's initial problems in the processing of applications have now been overcome. Unless their applications contain errors, students who applied early should know the results of the assessment of their applications by the end of September.

OSAP makes loans and grants available to full-time post-secondary students who are unable to meet the full cost of their education. Normally the first $1,000 of assistance is provided in the form of a loan guaranteed by the federal government. Students needing additional assistance receive it from the province as a non-repayable grant.

Lake Ontario project-

Engineering frosh further good work

by Phil Cheesman

Frosh engineers, under the direction of faculty upper classmen (frecs) invaded the waters of Lake Ontario Tuesday to construct a breakwater. Steve Kirby, on the Engineering Orientation Committee described it as a serious effort. "Engineers raise a lot of hell (throughout Orientation Week), so we do this to make up for five youths then kicked in the stomach and in the face."

The project, begun last year, has no completion date. The breakwater is to protect the beach to the side and is being built at Lake Ontario Park. Tremendous costs prevented the Department of Parks and Recreation from doing the work.

One freshman put their in-people to their residences. The involvement this way, "The service is available from dusk to 1 a.m. Students wishing an escort to do it, but we don't mind because it's necessary", when asked how he and his colleagues found themselves by the murky water's edge. A huge pile of mud and stones, supplied by Parks and Recreation, diminished as the afternoon wore on. Orders from the frecs were met by groans but work appeared to be carried out enthusiastically. Rotted bushel baskets could not carry the weight and the engineers looked to be in dire need of proper equipment. The toil showed on the freshmen's faces and they grunted, relentlessly heaving rocks.

A couple of hundred feet away, more were lugging heavy logs and awkward branches. The debris will be taken away to a dump by the Department of Parks and Recreation.

In all, 150 worked tirelessly. The Frosh worked with encouragement from the ever-present frecs. "Do you like this work?", they shouted. "Yes sir, Frec Sir", came the reply.

Meds man mugged

Rob Reynolds

Rob Reynolds, a medical student, and mugging are not commonly used terms when talking about life on Queen's campus. Unfortunately, inevitably they occur during orientation week. In an attempt to prevent assaults on students the Arts Science Undergraduate Society organized an escort service. One such incident occurred Friday when a first year medical student received several blows to the head and lacerations to the face after being assaulted by five youths. The student, who wished to remain anonymous, was walking southward on University Avenue about 8:30 p.m. when he noticed that he was being followed. He passed in front of Ontario Hall and heard one of the assailants say "Let's mug this guy." Initially the student thought that the five were joking. However, when he reached the entrance to the underground parking lot outside Kingston Hall he found himself surrounded. The student was forced to the ground by five youths then kicked in the stomach and in the face.

After the skirmish the student located a passerby who alerted the police. The young attackers have not as yet been apprehended.

The escort service, run out of the Orientation Nerve Centre at MacCormac, will consist of gals escorting people to their residences. The service is available from dusk to 1 a.m. Students wishing an escort to do it, but we don't mind because it's necessary", when asked how he and his colleagues found themselves

Although the editorial page is not the usual place for a movie review, Mike MacMillan's "The Academic Cloister" deserves special mention.

Shot at Queen's during the past academic year on a budget of $4000, the film is provocative, entertaining (particularly so for those who can spot friends in the scenes) and dangerous to the mental health of high school students.

There are no pictures of tams, no oil thighs, no football games. Why, there's not even a nice shot of Grant Hall.

The film deals with intellectual stimulation at university and the argued lack thereof. The film stars Professor Peter Taylor of the Math Department, Dr. Duncan Sinclair, Dean of Arts and Science, David Fritz, Queen's Grad, and a cast of hundreds of Queen's students throwing snowballs, serving food at Elrond, drinking beer in the pub and falling asleep in class. Vintage Queen's?

The point the film makes is that universities are primarily concerned with the dissemination of information. As Taylor put it, students write down facts, "learn" the material, reproduce it in the exam hall, and the instructor subsequently assigns a mark. "This mark," says Taylor, "represents that percentage of knowledge they (students) have been able to reproduce. When put in this way, you don't have to be very clever to figure out that this is not what students should be doing." (Taylor this year authored the Red Book For Queen's which elaborates on this point and provides an idealistic alternative.

But is rote memorization futile? Memorized information is quickly forgotten and it's a crashing bore to memorize. Still, information provides the catalyst to discussion when shared by two people. Queen's is a good university by virtue of its ability to still provide the atmosphere and environment conducive to intellectual encounters. This naturally, is the benefit of forming an "academic cloister" and Queen's cloister is better than most because of its size and some fine teaching-resource personnel.

There seems to be general agreement that more intellectual encouragement would be refreshing. Presently our lecture system does not demand that the great opportunities for such discussion be created. Teaching is an individual matter for the instructor and academic freedom is a treasured commodity. But do professors cop out from piquing intellectual curiosity or do students not bother to meet the challenge, preferring instead to throw snowballs, drink beer and fall asleep? OR are both parties guilty as charged?

At a private screening of the film for Dr. Sinclair, David Ellis, Head of Admissions, Dr. K.L.S. Gunn, Registrar, Peter Stokes, Administrative Assistant in Arts and Science and a few students, reservations expressed about MacMillan's message quickly relaxed when it became apparent that the film had achieved its objective: it sparked a good discussion of "the System". One spectator argued, however, that there was potential harm in the film by discouraging new university students. Indeed, without at least some orientation at university the film could easily leave one thinking that what we have is little more than an overgrown high school. Grades 14 through 17 where marks reign supreme and that one's time would be better spent with a few good books at home.

Third year film student MacMillan admitted, "It is one sided. That's the easiest way to get discussion going." He certainly gets discussion going (which in itself establishes an important point of the film).

"The Academic Cloister" is good. The National Film Board and Channel 19 (ETC) are both interested in the film. It was shown to the freshmen during orientation week and was presented last Tuesday night ahead of "If..." at Dunning Hall. Copies are available for rental at a modest cost.

Peter Taylor is to be commended in that he has provoked this critical examination with his Red Book For Queen's. Mike MacMillan and company are to be commended for their film which, though not directly related to Taylor's work, conveys much the same spirit. T.C.

SMU - so what's in a name?

With the near completion and partial opening of the John J. Deutsch University Centre students have a grand new place to relax over a few drinks and sandwiches. It's fitting that the new centre be named after the former principal. Deutsch was a great man and a well loved principal and the students were pleased to be able to commemorate his accomplishments in this way.

Surely, though, a like feeling of indebtedness must have been in the hearts of those who dedicated the old building and named it the Student's Memorial Union. The SMU was named in honour of those students who fought for and who died for this country during the First and Second World Wars. With generous funds from the students, veterans and alumni of Queen's, the SMU and the Memorial Room therein were built to perpetuate the memory of those hundreds of Queen's students who did not return from combat. It was their courage and ultimate sacrifice which led us back in 1948 to name a union in their honour.

The new addition to the SMU prompted someone to suggest naming both buildings the John Deutsch University Centre. This was done.

So what's in a name? Quite a bit, frankly.

May we suggest that the new section only be called the John J. Deutsch University Centre. The old section should remain, with respect, the Student's Memorial Union. T.C.

Controlling rent

Do you feel that the rent you are paying is too high?

The rent review officers at 74 Brock St. are ready and willing to explain and enforce the 1975 Rent Review Act which remains in effect until August, 1977.

The Act limits rent increases to eight percent. A landlord intending to increase rent above the limit must submit an application for rent review at least 60 days before the increase takes effect.

Under the act, the landlord must also provide the tenant with a copy of the rent review application form.

A tenant forced with an increase over the eight percent limit is required to pay the original rent plus eight percent if the increase is not validated. Tenants who have already paid in excess of eight percent on unvalidated increases are entitled to rebates.

The legislation, which applies to both verbal and written contracts, also considers changes in rental services when fixing the rate of increase. For example a change in parking fees would be taken into account.

Tenants moving into new accommodations who do not know the rent paid by previous tenants are entitled to ask the landlord for specifics. "If one fails to receive this information or is skeptical of the information given by the landlord, he should contact a rent review officer," said rent review officer G.A. Hobbs.

The Rent Review Act is applicable to an estimated million rental premises in Ontario, 22,000 of which are in the Kingston area.

Apartments, houses, townhouses, duplexes, triplexes, rooming houses, mobile-home sites and certain geared-to-income units are covered by the Act.

Residences at Queen's and other universities are dealt with differently under the Act. The sole restriction concerning raising of residence rates above eight percent is that the university first consult a recognized council or association within the university, before filing notification of such a consultation with a rent review officer.

Mr. Hobbs agreed that the wording of the Act with reference to non-profit educational institutions is vague, but said these cases would be dealt with discreetly.

Queen's residence fees have risen approximately 8 1/2 percent this year. The University complied with the Act, however, in that it consulted with the Residences Board, which has jurisdiction over all of the residences, before implementing the increases.

Other Queen's housing, such as apartments and houses owned and rented by Queen's are subject to the Rent Review Act. These have complied with the Act, according to Mr. Hobbs.

Brochures concerning rent review may be obtained on campus at the Housing and Property Management building at 25 Union St. For further information contact the Rent Review Office at 549-4426.

Returning students Cam Landell, Chris and Greg Shannon moving furniture into apartment at 135-139 Union Street, directly across from Sir John A. MacDonald Hall.

Queen's Five: Phase one done

A triplex at the corner of Union and Alfred Streets, under renovation since March as phase one of Queen's University's Housing plan, Project V is ready for returning students.

The plan calls for renovations to three structures: 135-139 Union Street, 121-123 Union Street and 168 University Avenue. Campus planner, Eric Thrift, says that current, high interest rates prohibit major construction projects, making renovation of older buildings the only practical alternative. Under Project V, construction of several new housing units and renovation of a number of older houses in the block bounded by Union, University, Earl and Alfred Streets, is to be undertaken.

Students, selected on a "first-come first-serve basis" by the university, are moving into 135-139 Union Street this week. Of the three self-contained apartments in the buildings, two have four bedrooms to rent at $400 a month and the third has five bedrooms for $475; all apartments are rented on 12-month leases from the university.

By October first, it is expected that another two houses at 121-123 Union Street and 168 University Avenue will be ready for student occupancy.

Party proprietors and patrons

Frosh Week is a time for great parties and reunions. In some cases the various spontaneous gatherings become very big and noisy. These events are good fun to be sure, but unfortunately the police are not as excited about the mass attendance as we the students are. In fact, if steps are not taken by the students to control their own parties, the police may just have to handle them by their own methods. If you are having a private house party, it is your responsibility to control your guests. Although we are students, we are still members of the Kingston community, and we are bound to abide by the laws of the city. Private parties CANNOT be the responsibility of the university administration or the student government.

Also, please remember that no containers other than wineskins are allowed into the Queen's football games.

Slaves & Shines

Charity Day '76, held yesterday afternoon, gave first-year Queen's students an opportunity to get acquainted with their 'new' community.

More than 1,500 "frosh" participated in this sixth annual Charity Day, which was sponsored by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society (ASUS) as part of the orientation program.

In order to raise money for the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation about 200 of the group shined shoes. Last year, Queen's "Shinerama" collected $2,000 which went towards support of cystic fibrosis research and clinics.

For the first time, a road allowance clean-up project was included in the day's activities to strengthen ties between students and Kingston residents. Litter and debris was picked up along Sir John A. MacDonald Boulevard and in the good cheer. (Export).

Many odd jobs around the house such as window washing, painting, babysitting and minor repairs were undertaken by first year "slaves" at the hourly rate of $1.75.

All proceeds from this work project were divided equally between Amnesty International and Camp Outlook, a student volunteer organization which provides 10-day canoe trips for underprivileged children. Amnesty International is a non-political organization affiliated with the United Nations. Its aim is to protect human rights throughout the world.

In addition to menial tasks, frosh visited hospital patients, senior citizens and disturbed children at local institutions; (eg. Faculty Club) taking along flowers donated by four local florists and their own brand of

What you missed...

Foreign students to pay more in 1977

On May 4th Dr. Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities, announced that new students from outside Canada will have a tuition fee increase next year. The fees for foreign students in the universities of Ontario will go up from $585 (at Queen's the fee is $600) to $750 per term or $1500 per two-term academic year for all university programs.

The move has been made to help defray the costs of post-secondary education, according to Dr. Parrot. The higher fees should raise for the province some $2 million for the first year and should generate $6 million by the end of the decade. The full amount of the additional revenue generated will not be realized immediately as the province will not impose the increase on those students who have completed at least one term of their current program of study by January 1977. Dr. Parrot said that he received criticism to the effect that he is "picking on the foreign students" by raising their fees and not the fees of Canadian students. He cited the fact that costs have been dramatically escalating while tuition has not been raised for four years. Dr. Parrot told the Journal that in no way was the move intended to limit the numbers of foreign students in Ontario universities. Dr. Parrot said in his statement to the legislature: "This new policy is not intended to recover for Ontario the full costs of educating foreign students. However, it establishes in the province a situation faced by many Canadian students studying in other countries. In publicly funded post-secondary institutions in the United Kingdom and the United States, for example, Canadian students pay higher fees than citizens of those countries but are not generally asked to meet the full cost of their education."

Queen's Principal R.L. Watts said that documents proving the citizenship of students will likely be required at registrations after January, 1977. This move comes as a result of the new tuition fee increase for foreign students announced May 4th by Minister of Colleges and Universities, Dr. Harry Parrot.

"Administrative complexities" was one of three major areas of concern outlined by Dr. Watts when commenting on the new fees. Another dealt with concern over the government's apparent attempt to limit the numbers of foreign students enrolled at provincial universities. Dr. Watts noted that the Queen's Senate adopted a report from the Senate Committee on Academic Development which stated that the proportion of foreign students in attendance at Queen's was a good one and has equalled roughly 6 or 7 percent for the past twenty years. Dr. Watts feels that Queen's students benefit from interaction with foreign students and expressed his concern that the new fees may discourage their attendance.

The other main issue centered around who should pay for the foreign students: the federal government, the provincial government or the student. Dr. Watts said that he considered the education of foreign students one of the best forms of foreign aid Canada can provide. Foreign aid being a federal responsibility, it appears that the province has "acted unilaterally" to reduce the Ontario taxpayers' contribution to this form of foreign aid. The universities will derive no financial benefit from the new fee structure. The additional money collected from the foreign students will simply be deducted from the provincial grants given to the universities, said Dr. Watts. Therefore, the move will save Ontario taxpayers money and will not benefit the institution.

The Principal also said that the university presidents were not consulted on the matter for their opinions but were informed of the new measures a few weeks prior to the announcement.

Foreign students beginning a new stream of study after January 1, 1977 will face tuition fees of $750 per term. By introducing this policy, the province hopes to raise an additional $6 million by 1980.

According to Ontario Federation of Student fieldworker, Abdul Gafar, the move is being condemned by the OFS and letters of protest are being sent to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Student debt cancelled

Queen's Principal Ronald Watts informed AMS President Jamie Avis that students need not repay the $130,027.00 outstanding on a loan made in 1948. Queen's University decided to write off the debt in order to give more financial stability to the John Deutsch Memorial Centre presently under construction.

Eight payments have been missed since 1960 when the union ran into financial difficulty. Dr. Watts said that the reason for cancelling the debt was his concern that "the assumption of these old debt charges could impose a financial burden on the (John Deutsch) Centre that might seriously prejudice its successful operation. I am equally concerned about the effect of an indefinite deferral of the loan."

He closed by stating that "I hope our action in cancelling this old students' debt will, in our present financial circumstances, be regarded as another firm indication of our support for (the University Centre)."

In a letter to the Journal, AMS V.P. (Operations) Paul Steep refuted the Principal's suggestion that the debt was the students' responsibility. He said that the University had used the annual repayments from the students for maintenance and repairs instead of applying it against the loan.

How many unemployed?

Senior department officials cancelled a five-year old supplementary survey on student employment, meaning the government has no way of determining if its summer job programs are adequate, according to National Union of Students (NUS) president Pierre Ouellette.

This year the department slashed the budget of its Student Summer Employment and Activities Program (SSEAP) from $60 to $24 million, will eliminating some 40,000 jobs normally provided by the cancelled Opportunities for Youth (OFY) and related programs.

Without an accurate assessment of this year's program there will be no firm basis to plan job programs for next year, Ouellette said in a letter to Manpower minister Robert Andras in July, asking that a survey be done in September.

NUS and other student organizations have repeatedly said that without adequate summer savings, many students will not be able to return to their studies. This year, the organization estimates that the rate of student summer unemployment could run from 12 to 25 per cent.

Andras has not yet replied to Ouellette's letter, but in a press release August 16 disputed the 25 per cent figure.

The minister said his department placed 158,000 students out of 502,000 who registered, this was a 4.46 per cent increase over the same period last year.

Galbraith at Queen's in October

minent economist Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith is the 1976 Brockington Visitor scheduled to give a public address at Queen's University on Monday, October 18.

During his five-day stay on campus Dr. Galbraith, the sixth Brockington Visitor, will meet students and faculty members in a series of informal seminars and discussions.

The Brockington visitorship honors Leonard Brockington who was Queen's rector from 1947 till his death in 1965. It affords the Queen's community an opportunity to exchange ideas with international figures on an informal basis.

WATERLOO (CUP) - Most Ontario universities are reluctantly resigned to boosting tuition fees when the provincial freeze runs out in September, 1977.

That was the consensus when the province's 15 tax-supported universities, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, Ontario College of Art, and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education met with the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) at the University of Waterloo June 18.

OCUA is an advisory body to the provincial government and serves as an intermediary between the universities and Ontario's ministry of colleges and universities.

Increasing tuition fees is one way to raise the 11.4 per cent additional monies the universities will need in 1977.

We all pay more next fall

The increase will mean an additional $87 million over the $762.1 million the ministry has allotted for university spending in 1976-77.

The University of Windsor was the most outspoken against the fee increase. Officials there argued that people in the Windsor area are "living through depressed times," and a fee increase would make things worse.

McMaster University argued that while a fee increase was inevitable, the long-range goal should be to abolish all tuition fees.

Balanced Budget

Queen's will have a balanced budget next year R.L. Watts told the Senate at their meeting in May. Last year's projection called for a 1.1 million dollar deficit for 1976-77, but because of the 13.4 percent increase in the level of government support and a decrease in the total number of teaching staff, the deficit situation has been averted.

NDP Conference

The Ontario New Democratic Party met at Queen's for its bi-annual convention from June 11 to 13. The major portion of the time was slated for policy debate. Federal chief Ed Broadbent and provincial leader Stephen Lewis both addressed the conference.

Symon's Report

The Symon's Report on Canadian studies "To Know Ourselves" was the topic of discussion at the June University Council meeting. Former Trent President Dr. Symons was the keynote speaker at the meeting. He reiterated his stand that Canadian universities are really lacking in Canadian content. The other main themes to emerge from the two day conference held at the Donald Gordon Centre were 1) that there is a great need for the universities to let the public know what they are doing and 2) that Queen's should maintain those things that it does best when tradeoffs need to be made.

Recycling Project

Queen's University now has an organized paper recycling program thanks to David Kempson of the Geology Department. The program receives old newspapers, reports, memos, non-coated paper from photocopying machines and cardboard, and sends it to the Prescott Minor Baseball Association. For each ton of waste, the University receives five dollars. The money is divided equally between the library for book acquisitions and Project Green. Kempson indicated that not only Queen's but all of Kingston is invited to recycle paper at the Dupuis Hall depot. He also said that additional depots may be located around campus if the project is successful.

Paper for recycling can be delivered in tied bundles to the Dupuis Hall container in the Computer Center. Signs in the building show the way to the deposit bin, which is available from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Outside these hours, material may be placed inside a 40 foot tractor trailer van in the parking lot behind the building.

Residences

University residences became subject to the Ontario Rent Review Board last May. An amendment to the Rent Review Act was passed in the Legislature requiring agreements reached between the university and official student organizations be filed or increases over the 8 percent limit allowed by the board. Prior to the amendment, the university residences were exempt from the controls of the Rent Review Act.

Rector Leaves

Bruce Trotter is leaving his position as Rector at Queen's University to pursue his studies at Oxford University in England.

Former Vice President of the AMS 1973-74, Mr. Trotter has distinguished himself through his valuable contributions to the student community at Queen's. At Saturday's Convocation, special tribute was offered to Trotter by Principal Watts who said "He has represented the students on the Board of Trustees with forthrightness and has carried out his responsibilities as Rector with dignity."

Trotter's successor as Rector will be determined by election when students return for the fall term.

Special Admissions Project Suspended

The special admissions program of the Faculty of Arts and Science has been suspended for a few years in order to evaluate the project and its potential for implementation as a continuing program.

Since 1973 there have been 107 students enrolled in the program. To qualify, students must have completed grade 10 and be over the age of 18. Students who were not qualified for regular admission were admitted if they showed "promise of benefiting from university work."

Students who have been admitted will be followed through the graduation "to provide a full evaluation of the project."

Advertising for the new applicants has been suspended, however, students who apply and who meet the criteria identified under the Special Admissions Program will be considered as special cases by the Admissions Committee.

Ken Brunner, photos by Milo
Last year there was the usual worrying that orientation was not fulfilling its purpose. There were fears that there was too much emphasis on the social aspect and not enough on academics. Orientation was in its second day when we went to the people who are involved to get their impressions.

Peter Bloemer, Eng. '80

Despite the tough time that the Frees give to the frosh, Peter is having a good time. He feels that although the Frees sometimes get carried away they are only out to have a good time and are not really serious. He pointed out that if it wasn't fun nobody would bother to show up. When Peter was asked whether he felt that a separate orientation for engineers was good he replied in the affirmative as the engineers don't need course counselling and it helps to promote spirit. He also felt that the orientation was good in that it informed him about the clubs and various activities on campus.

Pieter Geerkens, Gael Leader, G.G. 69

Peter feels that the preparation that was given to the Gael Leaders was adequate to prepare him to meet his group. The tour given to the Gaels of the services at Queen's was particularly of value as it helped to acquaint him with all the facilities of the University. When asked whether he felt that there were perhaps too many events planned he replied that such a wide variety was necessary in order to teach all the freshmen in such a short time. He felt that if they didn't learn what was going on in Orientation then they wouldn't learn until second or third year. Peter thinks that the drinking is unavoidable as this is basically a social week, and notes that he doesn't think there is any social pressure on non-drinkers. He also stated that, if it isn't taken too seriously the interfaculty rivalry helps promote spirit.

Sue Athersych, Gael Group 69

Sue dislikes the lack of spirit in the Artsci Orientation. She feels that they need something similar to the engineering uniform. Despite this she rates this Orientation above that of other universities as the other Orientations don't last long enough.
The full week gives you a chance to get comfortable with the university.
The Gael group that she is with doesn't stick together much and she thinks that this is good giving the individual his or her choice of companions. The divisional lectures were quite useful except they weren't spread out enough causing her to miss some of the lectures she wanted to attend.

Students working together

As a registered student at Queen's University, you are a member of the Alma Mater Society, our student government. By becoming familiar with the structure of the AMS and the faces that people its elected and appointed positions, you can get full value from your student representatives.

If you are concerned about an aspect of life at Queen's that the AMS might be able to clarify or change, do not hesitate to contact one of your representatives or the AMS office (547-6165) located in the lower level of the University Centre.

There are two branches of the AMS, and these are the Inner and Outer Councils. Outer Council is where the voices of the Societies of every faculty are heard. It is composed of student representatives elected in the spring by their respective societies. Outer Council meetings are held every second Thursday in the McLaughlin Room in the University Centre. Any student may attend these meetings and put motions before council. Attending an Outer Council meeting will familiarize you with student government operations and help you to form and express opinions on issues that affect students.

The Inner Council consists of three elected executive members, the president and two vice-presidents, who then choose four commissioners and a Student Agencies Director.

Jamie Avis, as President of the AMS, bears an all-encompassing responsibility for representing students' interests and providing leadership to the Inner and Outer Councils. He is the chief delegate to the Ontario Federation of Students where student views are articulated to the provincial government.

The Vice-President (Operations), Paul Steep, specializes in the financial aspects of the AMS. Kathy Wood, Vice-President (University Affairs), is concerned with academic matters and the quality of education.

The commissioners' duties

The Campus Activities Commission encourages and develops university social functions so as to provide a varied and interesting program for the student body. The major thrust of the commission in the coming year will be to co-ordinate a well balanced and enjoyable schedule of events.

The Queen's Entertainment Agency is an important part of the commission. This agency makes all of the arrangements for the concerts heard on campus.

The Internal Affairs Commissioner oversees the AMS Court, the constable system, Information Bank and those clubs operating on the campus. The commission also deals with the operational aspects of both Inner and Outer Council.

The student police force provides staff members at all student events on campus, ensuring that order is kept so that everyone can have a good time.

Info Bank relays to students any information about Queen's or Kingston that is required. Volunteers to staff the bank are being sought.

It is through the External Affairs Commission that the AMS maintains communication with and allows input into the provincial and national student organizations. Liaison with the community, Kingston City Council and district High Schools is maintained.

The Education Commission provides out-of-classroom learning opportunities. The commission will provide a comprehensive speaking program, bringing in speakers from across Canada in a variety of academic disciplines. The Education Commission also studies and comments on all issues that affect the quality of education at Queen's.

By and for students

The AMS rents houses from the University for student use. Student tenants are chosen through a housing lottery in early February for the following year.

The AMS also provides a typing and photocopy service through the AMS office in the basement of the University Centre.

The Who's Where, a telephone directory of all students and staff is available to students in October. This publication offers interesting and informative articles about the University and Kingston.

You are reading the first contribution to a new weekly column written by the programming directors of the Queen's radio station CFRC, operating at 1490 AM and 91.9 FM, broadcasts Thursday through Sunday each week and directs its programming to both the Queen's community and that of Kingston and area.

In attempting to provide quality alternative broadcasting, CFRC offers a broad eclectic schedule of programmes. These have been divided into seven programming areas: Jazz, Classical, Folk, Rock, Pops, Sports, and Public Affairs. Each of these has a director who will make submissions to this weekly column. We thus hope to provide Journal readers with previews of upcoming special features and, perhaps more importantly, provide some thoughtful insight into what CFRC is trying to accomplish. This should include observations on specific topics in music and public affairs and reflections on broadcasting and radio in general.

With over 12,000 records in our constantly expanding library, we are certainly able to provide varied, quality programmes. The Classical library is renowned to be one of the largest in Canada.

You may not have realized that CFRC is staffed entirely by unpaid volunteers from the Queen's community, and with more than seventy five hours of original programming every winter weekend, the station needs new announcers and technical operators. If you are interested in radio come to the new members meeting on Monday, September 27. Listen to CFRC this weekend for more details regarding the time and place.

In fact, we hope you will listen anyway to find out what alternative radio in Kingston is all about.

At Agnes

Decline and Fall

Kingston's rich architectural heritage and efforts to preserve it, is the subject of the current exhibition at Agnes Etherington Art Centre. The show was organized by the Frontenac Historical Foundation, and the organizers say that "it is a heritage whose extent and quality residents at best take for granted, at worst consider an impediment to progress."

The show includes 150 excellent photographs of local architecture and is augmented by 16 artifacts such as doors, hearth frames and mantels, and elaborate hinges, nearly all dating from the early and mid-19th century. Photos show examples of 19th century neo-Gothic and renaissance revival in many local buildings both grand and small. Several examples offer visual proof of what can be done to destroy, or to preserve our heritage. Several "before and after" photos shock the viewer as we see either the destruction of a beautiful classical facade, or the saving and restoration of a house or building through local effort.

Especially for those who are new to Queen's and Kingston the show should be a delightful and educational experience. Much work needs to be done, and handouts at the show will tell you how you can help. The show continues to October 3rd.

New University Centre is quite a change

by Liz Wood

The old and the new, the past and the future... Such thoughts are present as I enter the new University Centre and take my seat in the new Sidewalk Cafe which, along with the new main dining room opening this Monday, is the replacement for the Old Students' Union Coffee Shop and Wallace Hall. Nostalgia, (perhaps not to be experienced by this year's Frosh except in a vague longing to know what used to go in the "old building" as one new arrival put it) creeps over me as I remember the dingy old Coffee Shop, over-crowded, spartan in decor, and the loud reverberations of dropped cutlery in Wallace Hall. It's all over now, the past, and the future bodes well. The new "sidewalk Cafe" is a cheerful, bright (brighter than the large floor to ceiling windows) modern place. The seating arrangements are spacious and comfortable, and appear to be durable. The ashtrays aren't nailed down, so they may not last, but the caterers seem intent on keeping the place clean: not once, but twice while I was there, a smiling lady came and wiped off the adjoining table as people came and went.

Hopefully a complete menu with prices, now notably absent, will soon greet us as we enter, and salt and pepper will be available on both sides of double line-up system; at the moment, condiments are on the side which only serves sandwiches and salads, which doesn't make sense. The prices are no worse than before, and the food is not much better as yet, but the atmosphere, the feeling of actually breathing fresh air, is wonderful and I'm sure the new dining room will have an equally happy ambience when it opens.

A bank on campus is a most desirable convenience and the new Bank of Montreal, now open for business, is well-staffed and well-organized to deal with student banking needs.

One of my biggest beefs about the old Houses of Commons and Lords was the tin barn acoustics and the total lack of intimacy. All this has changed with the opening of the new pub. It surpasses all hopes and dreams, and is surely one of the nicest campus pubs anywhere. The modern decor (plus red chairs, stainless steel tables, charcoal carpet - floor and walls) is nothing short of opulent, if a little impersonal, and the acoustics are really okay. You can hear yourself speak easily even when the band is playing.

The prices are very reasonable. Bottled beer is 65c, 13 ounce draught is 50c, straight liquor is 80c and liqueur is 90c. Mixed drinks vary in price from $1.10 for the simple jobs to $1.75 for fancy potions. Bar snacks are also available.

The main entrance off University Avenue caused me some worry about outdoor lineups in the winter but Paul Steep, AMS vice-president of operations, tells me that the large stairwell has forced air heating and coils under the steps to melt snow. Still a stairwell doesn't hold that many people and come winter the bar may be well advised to add hot toddies to their drink list.

Steep said he is hopeful that live entertainment can be provided every Thursday, Friday and Saturday night, and noted that the new pub's seating capacity (400 plus with no entertainment, 338 with entertainment) compares with the combined capacity of the House of Commons and Wallace Hall (365).

My other concern, where to go when I don't want to boogie, but just sit and talk, has also been allayed by Steep. The so-called "quiet" pub with a much smaller seating capacity, will open in the "second term". It will be located in the McLaughlin Room. According to Steep there have been delays with the licensing commission. They don't seem to be in the same hurry we are which is nothing new. Other delays include finding suitable storage space, though one wonders why this is still a problem. The "quiet" pub will have no sound system.

So far, the new John J. Deutsch University Centre promises to be everything that was hoped for plus maybe a little more. The House of Commons is closed forever, the Coffee Shop is no more. Nostalgia notwithstanding as a basis for comparison, the old is over, and the new is much better.

Exhibition game: McGill 4 - Queen's 0

by Tom Shand

In an O.Q.I.F.C. exhibition game at George Richardson Memorial Stadium last Saturday the Queen's Golden Gaels under new head coach Doug Hargreaves and a traditional opening day downpour lost a 4 to 0 decision to old-time rivals, the McGill Redmen.

The Queen's-McGill football rivalry, although it has been somewhat neglected in recent years, dates back to 1898 when the University of Toronto, Queen's and McGill formed the Intercollegiate Union. With notable absence in this year's schedule of "the Toronto Weekend" or in fact any interconference regular season action whatsoever, it appears that if Queen's feels a need to maintain a traditional rivalry then McGill would be the natural choice to fulfill that need. Without question there will be a void in the year of the average Queensman without a U. of T. "zoo" to highlight the football season but for the golden men of the gridiron who represent this stately establishment there will be no tears shed, as the U. of T. Blues appear to be once again head and shoulders above the regular rank and file Canadian collegian footballers.

Saturday's game had to be considered disappointing for the coaches, players and especially the fans. The patch of mud left between the 30 yard lines at games end where green grass grew just 2 hours before, left a reminder that the 4 to 0 score was indicative of the amount of action if not the effort which had taken place. However the offensive potential of either team should not be judged on their performances on Saturday.

Thus, even though the Gaels offence reached a level of sputtering incompetence customarily restricted to the Argonauts of Toronto, there is no guarantee that they will continue to emulate the Double Blue in their practice of the art of self-embarrassment. When coach Hargreaves said earlier in the week that his team wouldn't be ready for last Saturday, he certainly knew what he was talking about. With some 57 players listed for action including three number 28's it is no small wonder that the offence could not co-ordinate their efforts. This problem was multiplied several times over by the absence of regular offensive linemen Randy Edgeworth, Kevin Thompson, John Wilson and Robin Clow, of whom the latter three were suffering from minor injuries but all of whom should be ready for this Saturday. To further compound the confusion, five Q.B.'s were employed with John Lynch, Doug Latham and Ted Bellinger each playing for 15 minutes with Bob and Greg Mullen splitting the final quarter. There were no noteworthy performances from the offensive team except for centre Pat Plishka who did a very commendable job of snapping the wet ball back to Ted Tyczka who got a week's worth of punting practice in just 60 minutes.

As is usually the case in early season action the defence appears stronger than the offence, as slight hitches in execution give the defenders extra time to react to and break up offensive plays. The McGill defensive unit appear to be solid with their middle linebacker Phil Roberts turning in by far the outstanding performance of any of the hundred or so players on either team.

Gaels defence also performed admirably with Larry Small and Tim Wardrop intercepting passes and co-captain Norm Hagarty picking up 30 yards in "aggression" penalties just to stir things up a bit. With the return of All-star Darrel Penner next week the Gaels look strong defensively at least against the smaller offensive lines

The Redmen's offence occasionally threatened to break the monotony that was Saturday, but always salvaged some semblance of boredom through acts of seemingly calculated stupidity which effectively squelched their scoring opportunities much to the chagrin of the 100 or so fans (one for each player) who would have been happy to have had the opportunity to cheer for anybody. Redman starting Q.B., Kevin Smith has a good arm but suffers from the same affliction as does Al's Sonny Wade, that is an overwhelming passion to throw the ball up for grabs. Second stringer Vic Pyowarczuk who played half the game seems to be following in Smith's footsteps.

The Redmen have only 10 starters back from last year and have a small offensive line. However, Gaels do not meet McGill again until October 9 and by then coach Charlie Baillie will probably be utilizing his main offensive weapons, notably fullbacks Trimble and Salvatori and halfback Tom Barbeau (75 yards rushing and 34 yards on pass receptions) as well as an arsenal of five receivers, much more effectively.

Gaels open their regular season at home against Bishops this Saturday with Doug Latham starting at quarterback. It should be an exciting matchup as the Gaels will be looking to avenge the 37 to 6 thrashing they suffered at the hands of the Gaels in their final game of last

Orientations not good enough

Garry Lewarne

Some programme changes in Orientation have improved the week over previous years. However this writer has some major reservations.

I had a long discussion with two upper class Engineers about the philosophy of their orientation. They believe that the arriving Frosh are both scared and confused. The Engineering Frosh have no confusion about their courses because they have no options in the first year. However, he (or she) does have fears of going to a new and strange place. Also, Engineering is very difficult in first year. To kill two birds with one stone, orientation for the Engineers thrusts all the Frosh together and attempts to unite them. It is believed that the Engineer Frosh will be less discouraged if he feels that he is not alone in his difficulties. If you can lean on somebody, help each other out when you face a difficult problem set, then you will get through first year. The orientation programme of the Engineers certainly accomplishes that and I have no quarrel with the ideal. What I do object to is the way it is accomplished and the bad side-effects that it produces.

It almost makes me sick to see a 19 year old Frosh screaming at an 18 year old Frosh. The Frosh is drunk enough to be the idiot commander and the Frosh gets the culture shock of a lifetime. This makes every Frosh equal and pulls them together (if only against the Frosh) but also degrades both the Frosh and the Frosh. The Frosh finds that he likes commanding and goes on a power trip (however small it may be) while many Frosh almost salute their Frosh after Orientation is over. Kim Sturgess, Science 77, says that part of the problem with orientation is that it is not made clear to the Frosh that the serious inter-year and inter-week is a game to be packed up and stowed away after the week is over.

Good things that have happened mostly the scavenger hunt. In previous years, Engineering Frosh ripped out toilets from restaurants and stole trucks to complete their list. This year, the Orientation Committee bought the toilet bowls, painted them gold and hid them. Trucks were taken off the list. Also the scavenger hunt was held in the afternoon instead of at night. This has made a huge difference according to Kim Sturgess. The only items stolen this year were numerous parking tickets from cars. However the Engineers collected those up and paid them off at City Hall. Consequently, the $151.00 for the tickets was the lowest scavenger hunt damage expense in years.

Arts orientation is an entirely different cup of tea. Arts Frosh are confused about the courses they wish to take and consequently the main thrust of Arts orientation is to get all the Frosh in courses with which they will be happy. Extensive, easy to find, course counselling is available almost every day. Also the professional dinners this year have turned out to be a real success. Close to 60 professors have invited gael groups for dinner in their homes.

However, the major problem of Arts orientation is, once again, a philosophical one. Gaels are so busy helping the Frosh find courses that they have no time to ask the Frosh to justify his attendance at university.

The Commerce Orientation philosophy makes it the worst orientation on the whole campus. However some bright spots are beginning to show through and perhaps it will improve in the coming years. Commerce believes basically what the Engineers believe; that each year must be united and therefore the Frosh must be humiliated. Although the Signing in ceremonies are not as depressing as the Engineers, they are still ridiculous. Where there is an important reason for the hazing among Engineers (i.e. a very tough first year), the only (rather weak) reason that Commerce can give is that the Frosh are united so as to promote friendship.

The newest innovations for Commerce are a Boss Orientation and a Student-University afternoon. At their orientation, the bosses found out about all the student services, available such as speed reading courses and exam preparation courses. The Bosses are expected to pass this information on at the Student-University afternoon where there will also be speeches about Bews and WIC.

In general, a lot can be done to improve all three Orientations. One way to improve it would be for 3rd and 4th year students to get together and write down all the different little things they have learned over their three years here. Then, events should be invented to get across that knowledge. With a lot of work Orientation can be improved but the faculties must use fresh new ideas and discontinue the old and tired events.

Towards dreams or degrees

by Jim Klein

by Jim Klein

It is once again that week when students wrestle with the question "what am I doing here?" and attempt to translate what meagre answers they get into game plans for a term or year or degree program or lifetime. Disorientation during this week is a characteristic peculiar to the frosh only in its appearance - upper year students have in their experience and friendships the wherewithal to better hide it.

Resembling as it does a fourteen-day excursion to Europe, the life of a frosh often invites ridicule from the initiated. To be fair to the newcomers on campus, however, it is necessary to remember the fears and insecurities of being a frosh. Stifling new freedoms drive most frosh to new heights of conformity, leaving them very much at the mercy of their Gael group leaders.

The rituals of frosh week are best seen as precisely that - rituals, neither meaningful social experience nor absolute farce. At any such "turning point" in one's life, rituals like those of frosh week provide a secure framework in which to become acquainted with the surroundings. The structures of frosh week have in the past allowed most freshmen comfort enough to establish viable relationships with the people and things by which they will be challenged, frustrated and consoled for the next several years. Consider in particular the valuable exposure to fellow students and University bureaucracy gained during frosh week.

While an orientation can make students feel welcome and comfortable here, such a program cannot even begin to attempt to channel the energies and myriad talents of the new students. At its least disastrous, an attempt at instant inspiration would lead to the failure of a basically large-scale operation to effectively touch those parts of people that are most individual. At its most tragic, the process would constitute an imposition of values, often arbitrarily, upon (hopefully) sensitive young minds.

While it would be a sin of sorts to tamper with such a resource as young students are, it would be worse by far to fail to inspire and encourage development as total students. Any Orientation is less than a total success if it fails to at least imply several important questions for the young student to answer to himself.

Do you consider yourself intelligent? To pose this question is not to suggest that those whose IQ is less than ten points above the national average should be denied admission. This is simply a rare acknowledgement of the fact that admission requirements here are among the most rigorous in the country. A student's presence here at Queen's is a tribute to his or her academic ability (a phenomenon widely confused with intelligence).

Do you have dreams? If you do, then there's nothing wrong with vocalizing or chasing them. If you don't, there may well be something immoral in continuing to breathe vital oxygen. For all the apparent hypocrites of universities and the world that they purport to prepare people for, Queen's is and hopefully will remain to be one of the better places to be idealistic. Even the cynicism encountered here is but ingrown dreams.

Do you want to prepare yourself for the working world? It's a trivial observation to say that that's what we're all here for. Yet in this preparation each student accepts demands upon himself. It is as sad as it is obvious that learning at will is seldom fit preparation, and sadder yet to realize that if anyone's personal interests influence success in a course it is invariably those of the lecturer and not the student. Everyone must strike a delicate balance between utility and personal satisfaction, something that is unfortunately easy only for the most naive or mercenary of students.

Do you wish to be educated? The gaps are widening between a university education, its usefulness, and a true education of personal relevance. While it would be indulgent to call beer-chugging technique education, there may be cases for granting credits for receiving left hooks, though the University seems to disagree. True education can be likened to richly fertile land waiting to be farmed, as opposed to the money in the bank, that mountains of facts, dogmatically assimilated, might resemble. There is wealth there, but it must be sought with more energy than it takes to simply attend classes and take notes.

Last month the Science Council of Canada released an important and provocative report entitled Population, Technology and Resources. The report is a fundamental part of the Science Council's ongoing work of stimulating public debate on important issues which face Canadians. The Report was presented as a critical reflection, by a group of well-informed Canadian academics, on the ability of this nation to deal with the problems it will face in the next three decades.

The Report argues convincingly that Canada will be unable to meet the energy, food and resource demands of Canadians in the near future if present patterns of production and consumption remain unchanged. The Science Council is warning Canadians that the typical patterns of consumption and growth create stresses which will be quickly exacerbated if the population exceeds 30 million by the year 2000. The Report advocates conservation of non-renewable resources, especially energy, and agricultural land, and demands increased agricultural production and increased density of urban areas in order that prime land be saved for farming. There seem to be three chief fears at the base of the report: the difficulty in meeting energy demands from domestic sources, the effects of current levels of immigration, and the problems of domestically generating vast amounts of capital by the end of the century.

The most controversial aspect of the Report was its recommendations regarding immigration policy. The Council argues that Canadian immigration has almost meaningless effect on the population problem of the world, but that it has tremendous effects on Canada's ability to maintain a high standard of living. That is, Canada is coming dangerously close to the limit of its ability to meet the needs of an increasing population. Since more new Canadians come from immigration than from natural population growth, the Council believes we should anticipate our problems and develop a policy of moderate immigration before the system breaks down. The Council believes that it is crucial that Canada expand agricultural production in order to meet the needs of a naturally rising population and to generate much-needed foreign capital from food exports. Fernand Seguin resigned from his position on the Council in protest over the Report Committee's refusal to publish his minority dissenting conclusions. He disagreed with the Report's appreciation of immigration policy and food export policy.

Why Queen's?

Have you ever wondered, as you looked at the mass of strange faces during Orientation Week or at the first football game, why all these people chose Queen's? Have you heard any of your new friends talk of a visit they made to the campus before they came this year and wondered when they came or what they did when they got here? And have you ever wondered what system of communication exists between your old schools and the universities?

The Schools Liaison Office, located at 131 Union Street beside the Admissions and Student Awards sections of the Registrar's Office, is the primary personal contact between secondary school students and the University. The members of the Liaison office provide secondary school students and counsellors with the most recent information available on all aspects of Queen's and report to the University the concerns and trends developing in the secondary schools.

Participation in the University Information Program (within Ontario) and in the inter-university liaison committees is the most time-consuming of the responsibilities the Liaison Office performs. Between the

Illiterate Test

OTTAWA (CUP) — An increasing number of Canadian post-secondary institutions are preparing literacy tests to screen "illiterate high school graduates". The University of British Columbia and Ontario's 22 Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology (CAAT) decided this summer to develop literacy tests designed to screen applicants in English and composition skills.

But the CAAT English department heads, while favoring a provincial literacy test would continue to accept applicants regardless of testing results, and institute remedial help for those failing to meet the grade. Such a test is necessary because "high schools are graduating illiterates who shouldn't have passed grade 9," the department heads decided at a recent meeting.

"Illiterates" seeking entrance to UBC will not be accepted and assisted simply because "the university is an institution of higher learning and shouldn't be required to give high school instruction," said Maurice Pryce, chairperson of UBC's English Standards Committee. Pryce said the three-year delay in implementing the test will allow time to develop an appropriate exam and allow high school teachers time to prepare their graduates.

Essay Banks

TORONTO (CUP) — Even though essay banks — distributors of pirate essays to university students — may not yet be considered illegal, two Ontario universities are acting to make it more difficult for the students who purchase the services. The governing council at the University of Toronto voted March 22 to take action against the essay banks if a highly-paid legal firm they have hired can find any legal basis to do so. The council is lobbying the provincial government to prevent the companies from operating.

But the University of Waterloo faculty council was told recently that term paper services "do operate within the law", and, while legal action should be considered, there are many ways to discourage students from using the expensive and "extensive" services. Following the University of Toronto, the Waterloo council voted to declare that "it is the right of instructors to orally question any student on the student's understanding of the material submitted in any written work before arriving at a final grade for that work."

The U of T's harsher method of control, set up by a working group on plagiarism, (an academic discipline code) makes the use of pirate essays illegal with penalties including expulsion for their use.

Faculty Organizer

OTTAWA (CUP) — Almost a third of Canada's 25,000 university faculty have organized themselves into 16 certified bargaining units, more than triple the number of units in existence two years ago. At the closing session of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) annual meeting here May 11-13, collective bargaining committee chairperson Roland Penner predicted 50 percent of Canada's faculty would be certified — or in the process of certification — within a year. Five faculty associations are presently in the process pending decisions by various provincial labor boards.

The CAUT delegates pointed to three main reasons for the faculty organization push:

- 1 government cutbacks in university funding which threaten to render certain jobs and departments redundant in the eyes of university administration.
- 2 uncertainty surrounding upcoming revisions in the Fiscal Arrangements Act which is indirectly responsible for federal funding of universities.
- 3 student demographic trends which predict decreased enrolments in the 1980's.

Charging that "higher education in Canada is the least planned of activities" newly-elected CAUT president Jill Vickers argued collective bargaining units will protect academic standards while providing needed job security. She said student-teacher ratios have increased "out of bounds" with the only limits being "the size of the room". Dismissing the contention that as student enrolment declines so should the number of teachers, Vickers said once the ratio gets smaller the quality of education will meet necessary standards. Also at issue is the possibility of administrations replacing full-time staff with cheaper, less-qualified sessional and part-time instructors.

Nfld. Fee Hikes

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Students at Memorial University face a 10 percent tuition fee hike and increased residence rents this fall as well as immediate suspension if winter term fees are not paid within 30 days, president M.O. Morgan announced recently.

Student union executive Neil Tilley called the increases an "assault on the welfare of all students." He said the union plans to organize student support against the hikes adding that the suspension policy "simply cannot be allowed to happen."

Saying that Memorial's tuition and residence fees are the lowest among comparable institutions in the Atlantic region, Morgan nonetheless predicted further tuition hikes, program and service cutbacks and dropping enrolment. He blamed the new federal-provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act proposals for the university's bleak economic outlook.

Newfoundland's post-secondary institutions stand to lose $14 million a year, he said, if the federal government goes ahead with a transfer of income tax points to the provinces and cash grant increases paralleling gross national product growth to finance post-secondary education. The present FAA agreement, which expires in March is based on a cost-sharing plan with the federal government matching provincial funds.

National Union of Students (NUS) Atlantic fieldworker Miguel Figueroa said, "Obviously tuition increases are no solution; they can't prevent serious cutbacks and enrolment drops."

Highjacking

Five Croatian nationalists who hijacked a U.S. jetliner to Paris returned Sunday to New York to face air piracy and murder charges. The 53 hostages were released unhurt after the French ultimatum to surrender.

The hijack was to promote the cause of Croatian independence from Yugoslavia and the prisoners feel they have accomplished their aim.

On order four major U.S. newspapers had published lengthy statements by the band and leaflets were scattered over New York, Chicago, Montreal, London, and Paris. The documents pleaded for Croatian independence.

The five prisoners, four men and one woman, finally surrendered when given the ultimatum to surrender or be executed if they harmed any hostages. They were given the choice of surrendering to Yugoslavia or the U.S., where a bomb left by them in Grand Central Station blew up, killing one policeman and injuring two others.

Soviet Jet

The Soviet MIG-25 that landed in northern Japan is not being immediately returned to the Soviets. The Japanese officials are still investigating the violation of Japanese airspace by the plane. The pilot Victor Belenko, is being transferred in secrecy to the United States. Officially the U.S. hasn't said whether the Japanese had allowed them to look at the aircraft or not in order to spare the Japanese diplomatic embarrassment for the Japanese with the Soviet Union. The U.S. technical specialists have been examining the plane, however. They are particularly interested in the radar system used to guide missiles. Also being examined are the twin engines and the airframe design and construction.

A mechanical arm on Viking 2 is stuck and is delaying an experiment to show the possible existence of life on Mars. The arm is used to collect Martian soil which is then analysed for the organic materials which are found in all life on earth. Scientists in Pasadena, California who are in charge of the Viking project don't know what the problem with the arm is.

Unhealthy Fish

On Tuesday New York State issued a health warning against eating Lake Ontario fish. There are increasing amounts of dangerous chemicals in the lake, the main ones being PCBs (poly-chlorinated biphenyls) and Mirex. There is a possibility that one chemical makes the other worse - Mirex may increase the body's retention of PCBs. PCBs produce cancerous lesions in lab animals and is suspected on birth defects and liver and kidney ailments.

Student Loans

TORONTO (CUP) -- Ontario's minister of colleges and universities has admitted his government will do nothing to ease the financial burden for the province's unemployed students returning to studies this year. Harry Parrott told representatives of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS-FEO) in a July 14 meeting it is "administratively impossible" for his department to change the awards appeal process for the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP).

OSAP awards this year consist of $1000 loan along with monies awarded from Ontario's grant fund. But despite the ceiling, raised by $200 this year, any additional awards to appealing students are given in the form of loans. OFS expects that many students are unemployed this summer and will require more financial assistance from OSAP.

The minister said this request was "reasonable" but that there is not enough money in the $11.45 million grant fund to cover the appeals.

But he finally admitted that any monies in the grant fund not spent would be put back into the province's treasury.

"It is highly unlikely that there will be any relief" for Ontario's unemployed students this year, the minister conceded.

Ont. Curriculum

The Ontario Progressive Conservative Party adopted a resolution at their meeting in Honey Harbor calling on the Ontario Government to reinstate a compulsory core curriculum in secondary schools. They want it to consist of English, a second language, mathematics, and Canadian studies. At the moment 4 English credits and 2 Canadian studies are needed. Also included was a resolution calling for compulsory French from kindergarten to Grade 9.

Chairman Mao dead

Mao Tse-Tung, chairman of the People's Republic of China, died early Thursday, Sept. 9, at the age of 82. His remains are presently lying in state for seven days of official mourning in the Great Hall of the People in Peking. The area has been cordoned off and only organized groups of mourners are allowed into the area to pay their respects. Mao's funeral will be held this Saturday. There is no officially designated heir to Mao and there could be a prolonged struggle for succession to the leadership. Possible successors include Hua Kuo-Fang, Premier of the State Council of China and first party chairman, and Wang Hung-Wen, second ranking party vice-chairman.

Mao began as a peasant's son who was elected head of the Communist party in 1935. From this time until the second World War he was involved in expanding rural Communist bases. Then in 1949 he led the Communists to victory over Chiang Kai-Shek and his Nationalist, driving them to the mainland. At this point, the People's Republic of China was founded with Mao as its head. He headed the Republic for 26 years during which time he unified a country of 800 million people, advanced the country both agriculturally and economically, and made it third among the world's great powers.

Mao's death climaxed a year of misfortune in China. Premier Chou En-Lai died in January, there have been huge riots in Tien An Men Square in Peking, and devastating earthquakes in the Peking region.

by Frank Pagnucco

Fourth year geology student Robert Moffat was taken to Kingston General Hospital after being hit by a truck Wednesday night while attending a party at 77 Division St. Mr. Moffat's skull was fractured.

The incident occurred when a yellow pickup truck on Division St. approached the edge of the crowd of people milling about on the street in front of the house. One bystander said the driver then gave a display of engine revving tire screeching before backing up to the curb. There the driver and his passenger were accosted by a pair of Science 77 students, Yves Gauthier and Bob Lafreniere. According to Mr. Lafreniere, both he and Mr. Gauthier "tried to persuade the driver to park the truck and join the party".

The driver got out and his place was taken by the passenger, who, according to Mr. Gauthier, said "You guys don't own this goddam road. I'm going to shoot anybody who tries to stop me from getting through". Mr. Lafreniere thought that the man may have been provoked by a tossed beer bottle.

Kim Sturgess, Chairwoman of the A.M.S. Orientation Committee, said she saw the truck approach the crowd again and put on another display of what she called crazy driving. She said that she and a few others, realizing the man's intention of driving through the crowd, began waving the crowd of partygoers off the street.

Most of the crowd had left the street when the truck sped forward. The driver apparently veered across the road from one group of people to another until it struck Mr. Moffat. It then raced away along Division St. in a hail of beer bottles hurled by irate partygoers. Mr. Moffat was rushed to the hospital and the police were called in.

According to bystanders, the police officers on the scene then were made targets of beer bottles thrown by partygoers. Miss Sturgess also was hit by a bottle while talking to the police officers.

"I'm really upset that students would do something as silly as tossing beer bottles at police officers when they are trying to help".

Mr. Moffat was released Saturday. He planned a week in Toronto to rest. The police have charged Howard Lockett, 27, of 81 Thomas Street with failure to remain at the scene of an accident.

Getting to the top

Brian Baird, one of three Engineering freshmen to take part in the annual grease pole event, was second from the top when the tam was abbed. Women are forbidden from participating due to health reasons.

Arson suspected in small blaze in Phys-Ed Centre locker room

A small fire broke out Friday evening in one of the ladies' changing rooms in the Phys-Ed centre. Although no ascertainable damage to the building as caused, boxes of registration material - the apparent object of the fire - were charred.

Although the registrar's office maintained the changing room for storage of such material it apparently remained unlocked.

Dave Zakos, a student employed at the Jock Hardy Arena, estimated a fire began shortly after 9pm

although it was not discovered and finally located until approximately 9:45pm. Mr. Zakos, who was in the arena when the alarm sounded said two youths, one of whom was wearing a dark brown trench coat, were in the vicinity of the fire and were advised by him to leave the building for their safety.

Arson is considered the cause of the fire, the protagonists being, however, "person or persons unknown" in the words of Captain Hill of the Kingston Fire Department.

Gruesome onlooker

A macabre feature of this year's grease pole event was the appearance of cattle carcasses - heads, rib-cages and other bloodied parts - found by freers at a nearby slaughterhouse.

A new justice for Queen's

There are two standards of justice in Kingston. One applies to Queen's students, the other applies to the rest of the city.

How else can you explain police officers in patrol cars weaving through throngs of drunken students, turning a blind eye (and a mute ear) to their overflowing parties. How else can you explain the ignoring of such violations as drinking in a public place, obstruction of traffic, creating a disturbance, common drunkenness, property damage and so on. Students have drenched citizens with water and tossed beer bottles from passing cars, hollered monotonous obscenities in every local tavern, provoked fights and generally raised hell. (On balance, however, students also raised a lot of money for charity, visited hospitals, cleaned up a section of the waterfront and did many good things during Frosh Week. Does this, though, excuse the violations?)

Although it is generous of the Kingston Police Department to overlook these mild infractions when charges could be laid, the police may not be doing us any favours. The citizens of Kingston are well aware of the somewhat special status given to Queen's students in terms of being held accountable for their actions.

A sound theory has been offered that the violent beatings and perhaps the suspected arson on campus last week are in some ways a manifestation of hostility aroused in local youths by the special status extended to Queen's students in the eyes of the law.

The tolerance of the police department during this week has once again exemplified a common felt appreciation in Kingston for Queen's as a university, customer and employer.

But there is no reason for Queen's students to enjoy any special status which would not be extended to another group of Kingstonians. Next Orientation Week particularly, but also through this coming year, the KPD should be a little tougher with Queen's. In the process we may see a decline in the proportion of justice as administered by Kingston youth. We may also see such gross miscarriages of justice as the one involving Queen's man Moffat. No charge has been laid against the Kingston man who, according to witnesses, purposely swerved into Moffat on the street at an unruly pace sending him to hospital with a fractured skull.

You can't blame the constables for not charging the driver. How in good conscience, could the police charge the man while Queen's students go unarrested?

Students and the CLC

In accordance with its traditional practice, both the National Union of Students and the Ontario Federation of Students have offered student support to the Canadian Labour Congress for its October 14th National Day of Protest. Both the NUS and the OFS have in the past been wont to blithely trumpet the virtues of the bond which they envisage between organized labour and student groups. Yet such a relationship, while never clearly defined, defies good sense. From the student perspective, the alliance has never one of political expediency. Rather it has been based on sympathy with fight for greater socio-economic equality in our society.

With regard to the CLC Protest, it is the tactics, which the CLC has chosen to employ, not necessarily the substance of its arguments, that should resist support.

The CLC is straggling the Canadian situation of non-compliance with the federal government's wage and price control program. A union can apply the same tactics against the Canadian public that an individual can apply against its employer. Having already received national exposure and adversity to the national program, the general strike amounts to little more than public blackmail.

Moreover, do students stand to gain anything by identifying with the union and sharing their cause? As a lobby group in its own right the NUS object are to forward such student objectives, futile as they might seem, of tuition and living stipends. Is it possible that the CLC supports these objectives? Will Joe Morris buttress the NUS position on National Student Day in voicing the public need to completely underwrite a university student's education and subsistence?

Surely the student leaders should concentrate their efforts on ensuring successful National Student's Day on November 9th rather than prejudicially its outcome by irresponsibly clouding the student issues with irrelevant dogma. Furthermore if the CLC protest fails to convince the public of legitimacy of its claims against the government, and the students have lost their brotherly support, the success of the theoretically student-oriented National Students' Day will be seriously jeopardized.

Whig Standard editorial rebuked-

New fees are justified

Denis Champagne

The decision by Queen's University to reduce its surface parking fees by 20 percent to $8 per month has come under criticism in the local newspaper.

According to a recent editorial in the Whig Standard, the decision "does not make sense". The article states that the reduction in parking fees will encourage more people to bring cars to campus.

Although the number of applications for parking spots has increased this year, according to Mr. A. Rix of the Parking Office, the number of parking spaces has not.

Dr. James Bennett, executive assistant to the Vice-Principal for services at the university, says that there has been some stockpiling of revenues from parking fees recently to finance major capital improvements in the form of tiered parking lots. "We don't intend to do this any longer," he has been quoted as saying, "in the WS, so from now on the surface parking fee will reflect only the cost of operating the parking system on campus."

A large increase in parking fees, as suggested by the Whig Standard editorial, according to Jamie Avis, President of the A.M.S., "would indeed discourage the use of cars on campus but would also increase the housing demands in an already cramped situation."

Another problem resulting from a substantial increase in parking fees which would tend to lessen the excessive demand on these facilities would be its discriminatory effects. Mr. Avis said that parking would be more easily available to the more highly paid academic staff members than the non-academic staff members and students.

The Queen's K.G.H. Parking Commission which is responsible for surface and underground parking in the Queen's area, has raised the underground parking fees from $26.50 to $31.50 per month, due to the higher costs of operating these facilities.

Stop in at the Info Bank

Brian Tackaberry

Info Bank is the student's information centre for any questions concerning Queen's and Kingston. It is staffed entirely by Queen's students on a voluntary basis. Each volunteer puts in one hour per week.

Info Bank provides information on all services, clubs and organizations on campus, as well as a calendar of events on a weekly basis. It serves as a phone-in service for any questions about Kingston and Queen's. Info Bank has a large selection of publications and pamphlets available to the students, ranging from all A.M.S. publications to helpful hints on safety, or to even tourist information.

One thing that students at university often need is rides home for the weekend and holidays. Info Bank provides a ride-board service for people wanting or offering rides.

In addition to these services, Info Bank also acts as the university lost and found office. If you have lost something, report details of it immediately to Info Bank, and we will see if the article has been turned in. Any found articles should also be brought in immediately along with the information on where and when the article was found.

Bulletin boards provide space for anyone to advertise an event or service, or anything else relevant to the student body. Everyone is welcome to use these services at the Polson Room in the John Deutsch Memorial University Centre, Monday to Friday, 9:30-4:30, Phone 547-5722.

Hobin concert "dynamite"

By Phil Cheesman

Make no mistake - The Todd Hobin Band who played at last Tuesday's Tri Fac dance love Queen's. The band is no stranger at Queen's and Todd Hobin, the leader, was pleased by the reception he and his fellow musicians were given. He spoke of the campus almost affectionately, describing Queen's students as "very receptive".

"I really dig it (the campus) a whole lot," he said. Although there were many students with varying favourite styles of music, there was only one kind they came to hear Tuesday night. "Rock 'n Roll, man. Dynamite", was Hobin's observation of their taste.

The band, well-known throughout Canada and the U.S., has a broad repertoire of its own material. Hobin feels that the location for his act is insignificant because, as he puts it, "the people come primed" to see it. "We give it to them the way they want to hear it," the guitar-and-piano-player claimed enthusiastically. He prefers a casual, informal rapport with his audience.

Todd Hobin, which is U.S. based, is looking forward to next year when it will be touring with such notables as Steven Stills as well as Daryl Hall and John Oates.

AMS holds Open House

In an effort to inform first-year students about their student government, the Orientation Committee held an Alma Mater Society Open House last Thursday. According to Sharon Reynolds, Commissioner of Internal Affairs, "We did not draw as large a crowd as we thought."

The AMS has tried to make itself more visible this year for as Ms. Reynolds stated "This was the first year the AMS Open House has not been held in the AMS office." Furthermore, the Internal Affairs Commissioner noted that there was an "excellent turnout of AMS people at the Open House."

Roulette wheels roll for Outlook as frosh spin for phony dough

Mary Anne Tateishi

On Wednesday night, all the Frosh cardsharks and gamblers could be found at Leonard Cafeteria. The event was Casino Night, and despite competition from the boat cruise and the Canada Cup final, a fair crowd turned out to try their luck at Blackjack, Craps, Roulette and Bingo.

The object of Casino Night was simple - trade in your money for "Funny Money", then multiply that money by winning at the games, and finally bid for prizes in an auction at the end of the evening. The prizes were donated by local merchants, and included records, books, sports equipment, and a grand prize of a racing bike. The money raised went to Camp Outlook.

At the auction, the stimulus of a night's wins, compounded by the freely flowing beer and liquor, created an exciting atmosphere. One popular item was an illustrated sex therapy book, indicating perhaps that some university students aren't as knowledgeable as they might pretend.

The general consensus was that Casino Night was a novel kind of entertainment, and a change from pubcrawls and dances. Win or lose, a good time was had by all.

Follow up:

More on muggings

Denis Champagne

The recent mugging of a Queen's medical student and other reported incidents of this type have prompted the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Orientation Committee to establish an evening escort service.

The escort service, which operates out of the MacCorry building, began Sunday, September 12 and concluded with orientation activities. There was a strong response to this service, according to committee representative Mike MacMillan, and additional student volunteers are being sought.

"This has been the worst year ever for such incidents," said Danny Peart, Campus Activities Commissioner. According to Mr. Peart, Alma Mater Society police constables, who work year round, cannot be of much help in many of these incidents because many of the assaults occur off campus.

The AMS is overseeing orientation activities for the first time this year. "The AMS is concerned about the 'increase,'" said Mr. Peart, "and I will certainly look into the possibility of extending this service for other special campus activities such as Homecoming Week."

Projects such as the installation of additional lights on campus have been funded by the AMS in the past specifically to help ensure the safety of the campus population.

Camp Outlook:

rewarding for the participants rewarding for the community

Colin Brown

It was seven summers ago that Ron Kimberly, a Medical student at Queen's, took a summer job at a psychiatric ward. Ron was a camping and canoeing enthusiast, and one weekend decided to try an experiment. He took one of the boys from his ward along as companion. The result of that experiment was a weekend in the outdoors which he believed no prescribed therapy could parallel.

Since then, Camp Outlook has kept almost twenty Queen's students busy each summer on a full-time basis. Canoe trips of two and ten-day lengths leave regularly for Algonquin Park and points north, each trip having one counsellor for every two campers. The campers come from a variety of backgrounds which would normally make such an exercise impossible or even unheard of.

Funding for Camp Outlook comes from several sources, ranging from an annual marathon dance to donations from faculty societies and private sources, most of which are handled by the Padre's office. This year Outlook Camping Incorporated (the project is an independent corporation, exclusive of Queen's University) had a budget of $19,000 of which $16,000 has been spent this summer, according to Deryck Williams, director of Outlook. This was the first year in which Outlook received no Ontario Government grants to aid in their funding. The remaining $3,000 is to be spent on weekend trips this fall.

For Trish Crowe, a second-year Queen's student it was a rewarding experience and well worth her while. Being a counsellor was no easy task, for a great deal of patience, tact and understanding is required from the staff.

Outlook offices on campus can be reached by dialing 544-6444. Enquiries are always welcome.

Local women drenched

Dear Editor:

To the irresponsible individuals who think it's funny to douse two area residents with water.

We were walking up Union St. on Tuesday evening, on our way to an important engagement, when a car drove up, slowed down, and threw water in our faces. Our hair and our clothes were ruined to say nothing of our evening.

If, in future, you wish to pull inane pranks on fellow students, that's fine, but to administer such treatment to local citizens is another thing.

We sincerely hope that after a few more years at an institute of "higher learning" a higher level of "maturity" will be attained!

Cut out grossness, obscenity

Dear Editor:

I'm in my fourth year now and I thought it would be about time for me to express my opinion, for whatever it is worth, regarding frosh initiation. Initiation, not intimidation, is great. It brings freshmen together in an enjoyable and memorable first week experience of university. The more bizarre the initiation, the better will be the experience. It allows a person to legitimately participate in a list of insanity which can be fun, and maybe even be therapeutic. But there are some things about Queen's orientation with which I disagree. I do not approve of the grossness used several of the Queen's cheerleaders. Grossity does not add anything to enjoyment of the week and is offensive to many, maybe most, the students. Grossity is not degrading to the student, it is degrading to the university. It is bad that many have forgotten how to enjoy clean fun. I submit that the week would be more enjoyable and beneficial to all if it were clean and sober.

Cabinet shuffle OK

The recent federal cabinet shuffle may shed light on the direction in which Prime Minister Trudeau hopes to lead his party in Parliament and across the country. With every month, the Liberal mandate nears its end. Trudeau must drastically revitalize his image and that of the party if he hopes to stay in power. Will his new cabinet provide the freshness to offset the challenge of Tony leader Joe Clark?

Any prime minister must represent the various regions of Canada in a cabinet as well as attempting to please such groups as women, native peoples and the business sector. Trudeau has particular problems with regional representation since the Liberal party lacks strong western and eastern presence in the House. However, he has managed to represent B.C. and native peoples with the appointment of Len Marchand, a Canadian Indian. Three women will grace the cabinet ranks and business has its spokesman in Tony Abbott, a corporate lawyer. The Conservative party has traditionally been the recipient of business votes and Trudeau must move to gain all the support he can.

Trudeau has lost several cabinet members in the past through disenchantment. Turner, Marchand and now Mackasey were men who commanded respect in the Liberal party and who could hold their own with the Prime Minister. Will the cabinet newcomers be able to deal capably with their own departments as well as invigorate a weak cabinet image? Further alienation of good cabinet material must be prevented at all costs.

Cabinet ministers must face formidably knowledgeable civil servants in accepting a new portfolio. Cabinet shuffles weaken a minister's ability to gain extensive experience in a particular area. This, in turn, can strengthen the influence of the civil service. We hope that the new ministers will be able to learn quickly and carry out policies favourable to the whole of Canada.

One government policy that may come to a head shortly is bilingualism. This policy has never been totally accepted and seems to be nearing the boiling point. The air traffic controllers' strike questioned the blanket application of bilingualism without regard for regional differences. Health Minister Marc Lalonde has stated that the government is considering the creation of a cabinet post responsible for bilingualism. If this does come about, it will be interesting to see who will be appointed. The appointment of a Quebec MP as minister may raise cries of bias towards bilingualism. This would be a very delicate position and could raise questions about the present bilingualism policy.

Canadian Companies exploit the South African economy

Brian Lawson, Ross Sutherland
Soweto - Black Students - Massacred - General Strike - Tear Gas - common words on the foreign news page this past summer. But the situation in South Africa is more than a sensational news story; more than a study of how students can and should take part in a revolutionary struggle; more than another step toward the end of western imperialism. Since the beginning of August it has made the West's role as exploiter and oppressor of the Third World a very real thing for Queen's. We have adopted a concrete representative of Canada's complicity and tacit support for the repressive forces in South Africa.

The Bank of Montreal on campus is more than just another step in the withdrawal of Queen's from the Kingston Community. (How long will the average Queen's student now be able to go without leaving the Union-University ghetto?) The Bank of Montreal, along with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Toronto Dominion Bank, has an undistinguished career of lending money to South Africa. Since 1970 the three have transferred $10.5 million directly to the South African government. In 1971 each contributed $3 million to the South African Iron and Steel Corporation. Later that year the Bank of Montreal gave $2 million to the Corporation and in 1972 another $2 million to the South African government. This is the government presently murdering black students and workers (over 300 in the past 3 months). As we can see, the pursuit of profits and greater investment DOES NOT hold any ethical or moral limits.

Through its controlling interests in Sun Life Insurance the Bank of Montreal is involved more deeply. It controls 8 of 13 directors in this insurance company, possibly the largest one in South Africa. Furthermore, the chairman of the bank until December 1975, was a director of Sun Life and of Consolidated Bathurst, which also has holdings in South Africa. Other corporations with South African Interest, and which are represented on the Bank's Board of Directors include Rio Algom Mines, Alcan and Rothmans of Pall Mall, the latter of which is 59.2 percent controlled by Rembrandt Investment Ltd of South Africa (so much for that nice cool drag on a Rothman's). We are sure that there is more, but understandably (from the bank's position), the information is hard to come by.

Nor is the Bank of Montreal alone. Alcan, Falconbridge, Weston's, Massey Ferguson (all Canadian based multinational corporations) and many Canadian subsidiaries of foreign corporations are a part of this society which renders wealth to whites and poverty to blacks.

We were going to suggest that students boycott the Bank of Montreal (still a good idea), and that the university do everything in its power to evict the bank from campus. In the midst of this, someone suggested that we enquire into the make-up of the Board of Trustees. We did. It appears that in 1975 at least four trustees were connected with corporations which were directly involved with South Africa, and that a total of 18 were senior officials in major corporations. Our plans seemed doomed from the start. So, as a more viable and potentially successful approach, we suggest that you get involved in the building of a revolutionary socialist movement. It may seem a bit extreme, but the problems, rooted in the dynamics of a capitalist system, are fundamental. Reforms have been, and will continue to be made, and are often of some short term personal benefit, but if we are serious about dealing with the problem, we are serious about changing structures!

The OSAP inequities

Jamie Avis

There is gathering evidence that student governments in Ontario are finally beginning to mature into their role as representatives of student interests at the provincial level. One example of the developing realism and political pragmatism is the OFS campaign for improvements in certain aspects of the Ontario Student Awards Program. Rather than making broad, ideologically-based criticisms and sweeping, rhetorical demands that have no chance of gaining government or public sympathy, OFS is putting forward concrete and well-argued criticisms of the irrationalities involved in the calculation of the contribution a student is expected to make from summer earnings.

In theory, the amount of an OSAP award equals the student's costs minus his resources. However, in computing resources, OSAP makes use of an arbitrary figure obtained from a table to estimate the amount saved by a student over the summer. Some recognition is made of the facts that summer wages tend to increase with the number of years a student has spent in university and that women tend to be victims of discrimination when it comes to wages, but no allowance is made for individual income differences or, more importantly, for a failure to find any employment at all.

The Ontario Federation of Students is insisting that arbitrary OSAP summer savings requirements be eliminated and replaced by an evaluation based on a student's real financial resources. This is a very reasonable demand, and one which Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, should consider very seriously if he takes any pride in the fairness of Ontario's awards program. Those students who make more should be expected to save more. This would reduce the size of some loans, but it would make more money available to assist those who can find only low-paying jobs or no jobs at all.

An appeal procedure does exist through which a student can request to have the amount of an award increased on the basis of documented financial need. One admissible ground for such an appeal is inability to find a summer job. If a student is well-informed enough to know about the appeal procedure and persevering enough to go through the inevitable red tape, a supplementary award may be obtainable.

Unfortunately, any supplementary award made to compensate for lack of summer earnings is given in the form of loan only, even if the student has already reached the 'loan ceiling' of $1000. This is clearly unfair, since it penalizes a student for not having a summer job, when the fault lies in the condition of the economy. The Ontario Federation of Students is therefore petitioning the government to have OSAP appeals based on financial need settled under the normal loan-grant ratio rather than the existing loan-only awards. If this proposal were implemented, no student could accumulate more than $1000 in loans in any one year.

OSAP is certainly of great benefit to many students, but it is not perfect; it can stand improvement. The OFS is trying to bring obvious defects to the attention of Dr. Parrott and his Ministry. We can only hope that Dr. Parrott is willing to engage in a sincere dialogue with students on these issues, and that changes to OSAP will result.

Notes on November 9th - National Student's Day

Kathy Wood

There are, I believe, two very important undercurrents in the post-secondary system today. The first is the critical eye which has been, and continues to be, directed at universities by both the provincial and the federal governments. The second is the general feeling of inferiority among university students - how many times have we heard the expression - "I'm just a student"?

I am convinced that these two currents are intertwined and no National Students' Day would be complete if they were not examined in detail. Most of us, I imagine, would not have to think long to cite personally encountered examples of why the university no longer holds its exalted position in society.

What do we intend to do about the plight in which the university system finds itself? Is it a blessing in disguise? Would we be better off to be rid of universities? Are there any real benefits to a university education for the individual or society?

Many persons involved in this discussion have said that we have to start at square one by asking why we are at university, and what we expect from it. Some of us would contend that most students don't know why they are at university and if they do, there is a good chance that they are here for what we might feel to be the wrong reasons. Because students don't know why they are here or because they may be here for the wrong reasons, does it really follow that they are living proof that university is a waste of the taxpayers' money?

I don't think so. It seems to me, in fact, that those who don't know why they are here may in effect prove the point of universities - the search for something which they cannot find in the "real world". This restlessness could quite easily be, I think, the admission of students that university will somehow prepare them to benefit society even though they don't have a clue as to how they will do it. What we come down to is the premise that universities society.

This, in my mind, is what the thrust of National Student's Day should be. If we use this thrust, debating the question of whether or not university does benefit society, then a lot of other things follow. Let us assume for a moment that we conclude that university does not benefit society. The next step is obvious - get rid of them. Take the opposite conclusion - that universities do benefit society. After explaining how, when and where these benefits surface, it seems natural and justified to claim that universities ought to be supported to the extent necessary to do the job well. If the public sector is convinced that universities are worthwhile, any government that does not give post-secondary education its fair share will find itself on the bottom of the Gallup Poll.

I am not suggesting that governments simply respond to public whim and take no role in moral leadership. In fact, if the truth were known we would probably find that governments understand the worth of universities better than the populace they serve and have exerted a dampening on reduced levels of support which the public has been demanding.

Secondly, on a microscale, all our other policies such as student aid and universal accessibility fall into place. For example, for the maximum benefit to society, we want those students at university who will benefit the most, not simply those who have the appropriate numbers on their bank passbook or were fortunate enough to have had "lucky sociological breaks".

I would like to see us begin with a rephrasing of the question and ask "What do you expect from university?" This question would lead to the discussion of benefits of a university education (or non-benefits, if that is the case). The university on the whole, however, is I think, on firm foundations. The only problem I can see is that some people who are here probably shouldn't be. In discussing benefits with both students and the community, I think we can do two things - settle in our own minds what the worth of the university is and gain public support not just because we may convince them that universities are worthwhile but because we have examined the whole question honestly.

"Governments (and the people they represent) will remain unsympathetic until they see real internal reform taking place". (Dr. Corry AUCC Conference) What better starting point is there for reform than examination of your basic premises?

Back to school for the hell of it!

Increasingly, many senior citizens, one of whom dropped out of grade school years ago, are going back to class. Take for instance, Jimmy Costello, 69, of Sydney Mines, N.S., who thought he was leaving teachers behind forever 58 years ago when he entered Cape Breton's coal mines as an 11-year-old. But in the mid-sixties, Costello began working on high school courses offered by the Northside-Victoria Amalgamated School Board. This year, he completed his first year of studies at the University of Prince Edward Island, a sight firmly fixed on a degree.

The educational program in Nova Scotia is one of the country's most innovative. "We don't call it adult education," says Ernie Morrison of Sydney, president of the Continuous Learning Association of Nova Scotia. "We stress the continuing aspect, and we're proud of the way we get different age groups together. In our pre-nursing course, for example, we mix high-school students and older people."

In Newfoundland and Labrador, there are 40 Community Learning Centres, each equipped with videotape-recording and viewing machines that make continuing education a practical matter. "We make tapes with the basic information people ask us for," says George Lee, of the extension services Memorial University, St. John's. "We encourage people to come to the centres - which we've placed in locations other than schools, like church basements or women's institute halls - and make their own tapes on things like the latest fishing methods."

Provincial Involvement
Sometimes the emphasis is on the and its requirements. For example, in the Northwest Territories, the stress has been on training heavy-equipment operators, airplane mechanics and other service-oriented people. Now says Don MacNeill of Ottawa, head of the native liaison branch department of Indian and Northern Affairs, there's a new demand among native people for management courses.

The Canadian Association for Adult Education (CAAE) - a private, 800-member organization founded in 1935 - is committed to making lifelong learning accessible to more Canadians.

"Over the years," says executive director Ian Morrison of Toronto, "we've had considerable progress and innovation within the provinces. But we need more data on a national scale to avoid the costly duplication from province to province."

Several provinces seem to have their own unique emphasis. Quebec's Education Populaire is recognized for its success in helping people develop their skills in citizen's groups; Saskatchewan makes heavy use of existing community facilities, and British Columbia leads in programs that are specifically designed for women.

"The Women's Resource Centre developed in 1973 out of a number of courses we had on the 'Changing World' at the UBC Centre for Continuing Education," says Vancouver's Anne Ironside, the resource-centre director. "Now we're finding a great number of people who came out in the past for courses like flower arrangements are coming back for such things as management courses and personal development."

Not surprisingly, language courses are especially evident in Quebec. "Aside from vocational courses, I'm sure the languages - English, French, and Spanish - are the most popular," says Paul Belanger, general manager of the Canadian Institute for Adult Education, a wing of the CAAE.

"One problem we share with the rest of the country is including women in all phases of continuing education," Belanger continues, "because they're still tending to traditional courses such as nursing and not plumbing."

Variety of Courses

The Canadian Institute for Adult Education has enjoyed success in its work with rural farmers, particularly in a project it helped design at Bathurst, N.B. The rural promotion centre opened in 1972 to train young farmers (selected from the traditionally poor dairy area) in such new methods as efficient feeding systems and in joint action to purchase equipment and deal with the government. Canada Manpower and the department of regional economic expansion funded the administration of the project, which trained two groups of 15 farmers at a time.

"We chose this approach - intensive training of a few at a time rather than trying to train them all - and our studies suggest it was effective," says Belanger.

The range of courses everywhere, from the very relevant to the just-for-fun, is astonishing. In Alberta, there are courses for the handicapped, the aged and the chronic unemployed. One may choose between cake decorating, powder-puff mechanics, dog obedience, tanning hides and skins, small-engine repair and plumbing installations. Or choose recreation: instruction in cross-country skiing is a big favourite every winter now.

Some courses remain popular because they make just-plan learning possible. The Adult Upgrading School in Toronto, for instance, is known by educators across the country for its success in teaching basic grade-school subjects to those who were never able to master them.

Rush to Learning

Jane Abramson, a sociologist and professor of adult education at the University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, sees three groups leading the rush to learning: those who have to stay in pace with technology, those who are well-educated and hungry for more, and those who are searching for a way to become more resourceful. "What's changing is the attitude toward education," she says. "It's becoming much more acceptable as something that continues through life, rather than something preparing one for life."

Alan Thomas, president of the Canadian Association for Adult Education admits to one worry in all of this. He wonders if continuing education is really accessible to those who haven't been successful in their earlier education. Are high schools, he wonders, doing all they can to make students realize they have a lifetime of learning possibilities ahead of them? But throughout Canada there are people who believe it accessible because they've experienced it. And so each year, more and more Canadians get the learning habit, adding to their own personal growth and to a new international reputation for Canada.

A new light on learning

Adapted from Imperial Oil Review 1976 Number 4 by Joni Blisshen and Shelagh Hurley

Our new identity may be as learners. We Canadians have been characterized as a nation of hockey players and earlier as fur trappers, snowshoers and singers of "Rose Marie, I Love You." But developments of the past five years have made obvious yet another aspect of our national character: an eagerness to continue learning.

Going to school these days isn't nearly as significant a fact of Canadian education as going back. There is a tide of adults with a new fascination for self-development. University-enrollment figures now show more Canadians attending as part-time students rather than full-time. Further, there's less interest in gaining credits for degrees. There's a growing trend to courses that offer nothing more than knowledge gained and satisfaction earned.

Each autumn, large crowds of adults, young singles and senior citizens alike join longer registration lineups. The nation's newspapers duly observe the phenomenon with stories of grandmothers studying auto mechanics, goldpanning students hitting payday, and such reversals as a Scot learning the intricacies of Cantonese cuisine and a Cantonese immigrant taking up the bagpipes.

According to Ignacy Waniec's detailed 1976 study, "Demand for Part-Time Learning in Ontario," half the adult population in that province is engaged in a learning program or about to be; the rest of the country is just as eager. Statistics Canada misses many courses (its figures on continuing education are limited to programs offered by formal institutions), but still shows startling increases in recent years.

There has been almost as much growth thus far in the 1970's as there was in all of the 1960's, and the sixties were years of constant growth. In 1960-61, enrollment for all courses in Canada was 570,000. The most recent statistics reveal about 2.2 million course registrations in 1974-75.

World Education

Canada's enthusiasm for self-development has been felt beyond our own boundaries. We've taken a leading role in encouraging adult education around the world, through our membership in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), an association of 24 countries that promotes innovation in science, technology, and education. And we've even invited international criticism of our own system. In 1975, OECD education examiners visited Canada and assessed our provinces' education systems. We got a good report, generally, especially in the section on adult education. "Without doubt, educational institutions in Canada appear to have been exceptionally successful in establishing programs that attract adults and meet some of their needs."

Then, however, came some mild criticism. "This must be seen," the report continued, "against the background of a rapidly expanding educational system that has caused large gaps in educational levels to open between the different age groups." Our adult-education program still places too much emphasis on developing vocational skills and formal school certificates, the examiners suggested. Too little has been done with libraries, museums and other public institutions.

The evidence, as seen from a survey of what's available, from Lord's Cove, Nfld., to the Women's Resource Centre at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, suggests—that continuing education involves people of all ages and backgrounds who are studying simply for the fun of it. Not that interest in gaining degrees has disappeared completely. At universities, credit courses still lead the way.

Study for Pleasure

Nevertheless, there is a clear trend toward studying for satisfaction rather than certification. "People are more interested now in human fulfillment than economic achievement," says the Rev. Charles Forsyth of Sudbury, Ont. "In the fifties, people were caught up in the economic growth of the country and, in their education, they chose with an eye to bettering themselves economically. In the seventies, they are more disposed to see a value in learning other than a certificate that will give them a better income."

Sometimes the joy of learning and the search for a better job meet at Toronto's Dundas Street Adult Upgrading School, a dingy basement classroom where, for the past few months, 60 people have been struggling to meet grade-school levels.

For such people, whether Ph.D. candidates of grade-five learners, the discovery of knowledge is more rewarding than a near-perfect score. Sometimes the discovery is about themselves. After her youngest child started school in 1970, Diana Cartwright of North Vancouver, B.C., felt a loose end. Then she saw an article on a course offered by the University of British Columbia, "Options for Women."

"It was the beginning of my personal growth," she says. "I took courses in such things as 'Developing Personal Potential,' which help a person sort out priorities." Then Cathcart and others thought of establishing a Women's Resource Centre at UBC. Today she is a counselor at the centre and this fall plans to take credit courses in sociology and anthropology.

The following popular misconceptions were related in the last edition of the Queen's Journal:

The Black Book Theory: That Queen's rates high schools and multiplies your high school mark by some factor in order to equalize discrepancies in high school teaching.

The Relatives Theory: That if your relatives came (or come) to Queen's that you will be given special consideration.

The First Choice Theory: That if you rank Queen's as anything other than your first choice on your application that you can forget about getting in.

The Cut Off Mark Theory: That if your average in Grade 13 fell below that year's ever escalating "cut-off mark" you can forget about getting in.

The Geographical Quota Theory: That if you come from any particular area of Canada (even Kingston) that this will play a part in your acceptance-rejection.

The Certain Subjects Theory: That if you take (don't take) certain subjects in high school you stand a better (worse) chance of getting in. Have we missed any? Did you get into Queen's solely on the strength of your high school academic record? Write: The editor, Queen's Journal, Student's Union.

Ian McLeod

Ian felt that it is much "easier to be admitted to Law school or the M.B.A. program if one is an undergraduate of Queen's." He felt this phenomenon does not exist to the same extent in the general arts departments. He went on to say, however, that Queen's is "much fairer than a lot of other universities in allowing outside students into post grad programs." Ian has noted a lower percentage of Western Canadian students in attendance at Queen's since he first came here five years ago, but attributes this to better facilities in the West and not as a conscious effort on behalf of the admissions office to fill a geographical quota. When asked if he felt there was any truth in the idea that the only way of gaining ad-

Don McLean (Arts '77)

Don agreed completely with the first choice Queen's only theory. "Queen's won't look at you...they don't have to since approximately 22,000 people apply for 2700 first year openings." "Four years ago liaison looked at the background of parents, now they can afford to pick the cream of the crop, regardless of backgrounds...it's a cut and dry affair." Don felt there is a geographical quota "to some extent." Admissions must take into consideration which subjects you have taken in high school, simply so they won't overload a certain faculty. They are missions was to put Queen's as your first choice, Ian replied in the negative.

Karen Kearney (Arts '80)

Karen felt there was little truth to the first choice theory. "Queen's was my first choice, I had average marks, and I got in." Karen did feel however, that having relatives who are Queen's graduates made acceptance a little easier, or "why else would they ask you on your application form if you have any relatives who are alumni?"

She felt that perhaps extracurricular activities in high school has something to do with being admitted. "There is a large percentage of student council presidents and representatives!" Karen felt there was little truth to the geographical quota theory since she's met people "from all over Canada" looking for stock to fill up the years requirements for people."

McOwan's All's Well looks good

The Queen's Department of Drama is pleased to open its 1976-77 season with All's Well That Ends Well by William Shakespeare. The production runs two evenings only, September 24 and 25 at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

While firmly rooted in everyday life and possessing the most precise psychology, All's Well seems to inhabit a world of its own, a world which transcends time, place, and dramatic conventions. Hence, the production is centred around the Regency period, but is deliberately inaccurate with detail. It thus attempts to create a realistic yet magical world for this, Shaw's favorite Shakespearean play.

The production is directed by the great British director Michael MacOwan. In a distinguished theatrical career, MacOwan has directed at the Old Vic, Stratford, the West End, Broadway and the St. Lawrence Centre. A former Principal of the London Academy of Music and Dramatic Arts, the first Drama Director of the Arts Council of Great Britain, he has recently returned to acting on BBC-TV. In recognition of his services to the theatre, the Queen recently made MacOwan a Commander of the British Empire.

Scenery is designed by Russ Waller, a professor of design at Queen's. Costumes are by Debra Hanson, a freelance designer, most recently with Neptune Theatre, Halifax. Original music for both shows was written by Richard Bronskill. The entire production is supervised by Bernard Burkom, professor of directing at Queen's.

This production derives from a special Wintario-supported summer project which explored methods of producing period plays. It tries to remain as close as possible to Shakespeare's intentions. Along with Oke Dokey (a play set in the 1940's and improvised by the cast with the assistance of Canadian playwright Carol Bolt), which was a free interpretation of the Shakespearean play, All's Well toured southern Ontario this summer.

All's Well is being revived to provide the larger university community with the opportunity to see a show which one critic called "the clearest Shakespearean production I've ever seen". All tickets cost only $1 and are on sale at the Drama Desk 547-6291.

Theatre in Kingston is alive and well

Eric Hughes

The fact that Kingston lies halfway between Montreal and Toronto has proven very fortunate for those living here. We are close enough to those major centres to visit them and to enjoy their attractions, or to have these attractions visit us. Yet we are far enough away that we cannot survive on imported goods alone.

The Kingston-centred theatre has grown in the past quarter century to include performances of classics to musical comedy, Broadway to Grand Opera. Kingston has developed its own theatre world catering to the demands of the Kingston audience.

Tribute must be paid to the scale and diversity of Kingston theatre. Personally, I can think of few other places where I would have had the opportunities that I have found here-on stage, backstage and in the audience-and still only sampling what is available.

The DOMINO theatre at 370 King Street West (just west of the main residence complex on the lake), is this season celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary. It is a community theatre group, a totally amateur effort that often combines the talents of former pros and those of the future. This year's opener "Move Over, Mrs. Markham" is a play in the best tradition of the English bedroom farce. It is a well-written comic romp about the various marital misadventures of a children's book publisher, his fashionable Mayfair wife and their avant-garde interior designer. It opens this Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

Domino will be presenting eight shows this year, from British humour (in "No Sex Please, We're British"), to classic French farce, (in Feydeau's "13 Rue de L'Amour"), to contemporary Canadian, ("Hard Maple" a world premiere and Domino's next show). Auditions for these plays and the others of the season are open to the public and are advertised in the Kingston Whig-Standard. There is always room for willing hands in community theatre, and Domino is a good place to start.

There are two other organizations in Kingston that present amateur productions. The first is the KINSMEN who have been putting on shows for a good twenty-five years. Their annual fall musical is always welcomed by the Kingston audiences as their productions are often very lavish. This year's show will be the ever-popular "Oliver".

Where the Kinsmen specialize in popular Broadway musical comedies, the Kingston MEISTERSINGERS present musicals of a different nature. In the past, the operetta has been their main outlet, last year's presentation being Gilbert and Sullivan's "Ruddigore". This year's production will surely follow in the same tradition of providing a form of entertainment that would otherwise be neglected.

This year, the ST. LAWRENCE COLLEGE theatre arts department will be presenting four plays in the Grand Theatre and in their own space on the St. Lawrence campus. The department is undergoing a transformation from a general theatre programme to a more technically oriented one. Therefore, in each production, there will be professional actors working with the unpaid talent. The opening production will be Durrenmatt's "The Physicists".

Kingston is also lucky enough to be the home of two professional companies. The first is THEATRE 5, working out of the Brewery Lane theatre at 370 King West. This group has been in town for a number of years performing scripted plays and original revues to appreciative audiences. Their work has been applauded around the country, and this season will see them presenting their very funny "Nautical Revue", (September 20-25) "Sittin' on a Snake Rail Fence" and other revues and plays, including Noel Coward's "Design for Living" next June.

A tribute to the vitality of the Kingston theatre is the formation of a new group, the PENDRAGON company which will (tentatively) operate out of the Brewery Lane theatre when Theatre 5 is on tour. The group is composed of Queen's students and Kingstonians and will open its season with the production of an original play "Love's Labour's Won", November 18. This play will be taken on tour in January and a second play will be presented in the second term.

Theatre in Kingston is a thriving business. I've so far only mentioned those presentations that originate in town and outside the university. Next issue we'll deal with theatre at Queen's.

Coffeehouse is underway

Bitter Grounds Coffeehouse returns this following Saturday, September 25, with folk artist Terry Christenson. Throughout the year, Bitter Grounds will be presenting both good times and good music, ranging through blues to bluegrass to folk to traditional, in the form of individual performers and groups. This year the admission charge is $2.50, representing an increase of 25 cents over that of last year. The price change is necessitated by increased performers' fees. Membership cards are compulsory for all first-time attendees and remain at 75 cents.

The practice of using memberships is common among coffeehouses (ie. Fiddler's Green in Toronto) and provides Bitter Grounds with a "reserve" which will be put towards booking performers whom we would not otherwise be able to afford. Examples of this from last year would be the booking of the 'Dixie Flyers' and 'Michael Cooney'. Although the combined admission and membership fee results in a high initial cost ($3.25), it is one which is necessary if we hope to offer the same calibre of talent as in past years.

Tickets will be sold on Thursdays and Fridays from 10:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. in the Polson Room and at the door on the night of the performance. I would urge people to buy tickets in advance if possible, as this prevents extended line-ups (a Queen's tradition!), as well as frustration for those unable to get in when tickets are sold out.

Again this year, Bitter Grounds will be presenting guest sets between those of the featured performer. These sets will offer Queen's students an opportunity to display their talents. Anyone interested in performing should contact Craig Pinchen through his mailbox in the Engineering Society office (Clark Hall) or by calling 544-4540.

A night on the Town satisfies

Bob Murphy

Rod Stewart is one of the few remaining singers who can consistently choose first-rate material and-or material which becomes first-rate through personal interpretation. Such inconsistency has always been the nemesis of Linda Ronstadt, for instance. It can be a most frustrating struggle for an artist to overcome inappropriate material.

Aside from his ability to select good songs, Stewart is a fine songwriter. This time out Rod offers four originals, all of which rank among the best he's ever written, and all of which provide the finest moments on 'A Night on the Town'.

Tom Dowd is producing again and sticks pretty much to the same format he employed on 'Atlantic Crossing'. His lush treatments pervade the 'slow' side of the record. The delicate strings, haunting organ runs and elegant guitar figures work surprisingly well. It is doubtful, that the production would have come off as effectively had he been working with a lesser artist than Stewart.

On the other track, 'Tonight's the Night', 'the Rooster' effortlessly cuts through the syrup, delivering a powerfully confident, yet tender, vocal that beautifully captures the feeling of the beginning of a relationship.

Stewart's favourite pose has always been that of the naive innocent, so vulnerable, and thus inevitably followed closely by heartache, wherever he may wander. It is a lovable character who is often hurt, yet rarely bitter. After teasing us with the promise of a lasting relationship, in 'Tonight's the Night', Rodney turns the tables and lets the remainder of the album embrace this theme of lost love.

'Cat Stevens' 'The First Cut is the Deepest' acts as a good vehicle for this, and is actually the only cover that stands up favourably to the originals on the album. This is not because the songs or the performances are poor. In most cases it's merely because the excellence of Stewart's own songs overshadows them.

'I'm gonna leave my records-and a forwarding address-Ain't you glad Honey-that I'm off of your chest?' Honey-that I'm off of your chest? He sings in 'Fool for You', then adds: 'Guess I'll always love you, all my life', and off he goes, broken-hearted but no wiser, as evidenced by 'Ball Trap' the opening track on the 'fast' side. Here we find Rod caught up in yet another round of fearless love.

'Ball Trap' is the only Stewart-penned rocker, and is by far the standout on the fast side. Kicked along by a cacophonous mixture of pounding rock'n'roll piano, churning guitar and raucous horns, featuring a desperately aggressive vocal, it is probably the most exciting piece Rod has ever laid on vinyl. It also boasts some of the best lyrics recently heard live.

I'd rather see you dead-with a rope 'round your neck-or see you paralyzed-in both of your thighs-Come on Honey-You've got me crawling down on my knees", or "my mama don't like you-and I ain't surprised-you got poison lips-you got amphetamine eyes-she keeps on saying-why don't you find a nice country girl-But Lord I ain't never been in love before-I can't sleep or eat all week-but Friday night-I'll be alright-on a midnight trampoline."

After "Ball trap" however, the rest of the fast side pales miserably in comparison. In fact, if not for "Balltrap" I would be tempted to think that Rod should begin sticking only to slow or mid-tempo songs.

"Pretty Flamingo" as a mock tango is an interesting idea that just fails to hit the mark. "Tradewinds" is another attempt at a great album closer in the same vein as "Sailing". It isn't. As for what it's doing on the fast side-well, Rod only knows.

"The Killing of George" (Parts I and II), the last song on the slow side, is everything "Tradewinds" tries so hard to be, and much more. It is a return to the tenderness hinted at in "Tonight's the Night" only a much different brand of affection.

Here is Stewart, noted for his 'bad boy' reputation in rock, going out on a limb, not for another one-night lover (which he knows as well as we, will toss him over without a thought), not for love at all in fact, but for friendship. The effect is breathtaking.

He tells the story of the murder of a gay friend, and through his matter-of-fact understatement, pulls it off flawlessly. "George boy was gay-guess nothing more and nothing less"

A victim of these gay times it seems, he sings. And at the end merely, "George was a friend of mine" Stewart doesn't take this stance (a bold one, even today) to arouse controversy. He tells the story because it should be told, and for no other reason, and he should be admired for that.

To be admired even more, however, is the music itself. It signifies Stewart's 'coming of age' as a composer. The exquisite guitar, organ and strings create a delicate texture that frames the story perfectly, and the chorus, right out of Lou Reed's "Walk on the Wild Side", brings with it just the right connotations.

While Part II owes more than a little to the Beatles' "Don't Let Me Down", "the Killing of George" as a whole is Stewart's most complex and awe-inspiring work yet.

What "A Night on the Town" most clearly and convincingly points out is that, while in the past Rod Stewart has had considerable success as an interpreter of other people's songs, in the future he really has little need to look further than his own material to fulfill the promise of satisfying records.

Bromberg band talented

Trisha Crowe

The gods were determined to foil success at the first showing of the David Bromberg Band in Grant Hall last Thursday night. After a one hour wait, which is becoming par for the course at Queen's concerts, the musicians had to compete with a sound system that made it difficult to clearly hear individual instruments and almost impossible to discern lyrics. The lighting system insisted on playing tic-tac-toe all over the stage, ignoring the performers, but despite these problems, a good sound was coming through.

Ron Nigrini, as a warm-up artist, was excellent. His slow and easy informality, coupled with a strong voice and good guitar picking, succeeded in manipulating the atmosphere in Grant to make the audience more receptive to what was in store.

Nigrini played most of his own material which included various interests. "Kitty Star" told of the love of a 10-year old for a girl who rode in a rodeo, and expressed the intensity of puppy love; "I love you more than baseball, Kitty Star". The difficulties of being a travelling musician were well disclosed in "On the Road" and "Molly I Ain't Getting any Younger", the latter being the plea of a 45 year-old man wishing to end his travelling life and return to his wife and family. Nigrini also presented his version of Keith Carradine's "I'm Easy" and Oylan's "You Ain't Going Nowhere".

When the Bromberg band appeared, the audience was more than ready. Bromberg himself is an amazingly talented man, having played guitar, mandolin, Oobro, and fiddle since he was thirteen years old. His band members are equally talented in their respective fields. Dick Fagy (fiddle, banjo and guitar) accompanied Bromberg on a few duets, and the music they produced was in perfect harmony. Fagy played a beautiful guitar solo, "The Bowrey Bucksins", but had to compete with polka music which was coming over the speakers from CFRC.

Bromberg played a variety of tunes ranging through Scottish ballads to rock to jazz and then folk. He sang a melancholy song of coming home after three months on the road and how he felt like Rip Van Winkle. He and Fagy started into a "Bluebird" duet, then other band members gradually joined them. The versatility of these men is quite impressive; John Firmin is proficient at both flute and saxophone, Hugh McDonald on bass, Steve Mosley on drums, and Curt Lindbert on trombone.

The performance all in all was a good one. The band seemed to be working up to something great, and though they never quite seemed to make it, this did not detract from a very pleasant evening.

Willie P. Bennett

Hard luck boy is making good

Davis Eagle

Scarecrow Coffeehouse started its second season of operation this weekend with a performance by Willie P. Bennett. I've been acquainted with Willie's music for some time and have always felt that he failed to do his songs justice; in fact I preferred his material when done by others. Since I first saw him in London four years ago, I thought him almost totally lacking in the sensitivity required to express what his material demanded. With this in mind you will appreciate the trepidation I felt when I went to see him. My fears were groundless. He was funny, frank, tender, and tough when he had to be, finally making the music that is in his songs just waiting to be heard.

The opening guest set by Peter Ruddy was well received by the near capacity crowd and though low key in nature proved to be the perfect warm-up. Especially welcome was his solo dulcimer work which complimented his original material nicely. Willie then took the stage and picked up the pace with acoustic versions of songs off his first album, Trying To Start Out Clean. The best of the set was "Me And Molly" as well as "Country Squall" although all of his songs benefitted from his improved guitar playing and subtle vocal approach to the country-swing format which he follows. Newer tunes were featured in the second set and hopefully will be on his next record. Two ballads impressed me very much and only repeated listenings will decide the favourite between "Foolin' Yourself" and the one which followed the rap about his job in an underwear factory. Willie seemed to have a number of fans in the audience who knew his act rather well and requested their favourites when the opportunity arose. One such request was for the Blues number called "Mescaline Stomp" which may have something to do with his image real or not. As they say, you're only as good as your last gig, and because of Willie's I'm a new admirer.

Bishop's Gaitor's outpoint Gaels

by Tom Shand

Queen's Golden Gaels and Bishop's Gaitors provided a large crowd at George Richardson Memorial Stadium with all the required ingredients for an exciting Saturday afternoon of football. It was anything but a typical opening day for our usually rain-plagued footballers as the sun shone bright in defiance of the surrounding clouds. The game ended with Gaitors ahead 34-27 thereby leaving the Gaels with a very difficult uphill path to the playoffs.

The games frantic pace was set on the opening kickoff as Darrel Penner raced unimpeded for 100 yards down the sidelines the final 40 yds. with the ball raised proudly high for all to see after Bob O'Doherty had given him the ball on the reverse. Penner performed brilliantly throughout, both as a kick returner and in his new "monster" position from which he recovered a Gaitor fumble which prevented the Gaitors from taking the lead late in the first half.

The Gaels remaining 21 points all belonged to sophomore Blaine Shore who finally did what he alone knew he could do before. The white-shoed Shore not only scored two touchdowns but also added 3 converts and 2 field goals from 30 and 16 yds., the first of which was set up by a 40 yd. punt return by the remarkable Mr. Penner. Later in the first half Shore put the Gaels on top on a 15 yd. pass from Doug Latham after Shore had taken Gaitors defender Kenny Reardon right out to lunch with a great move. Shore's fourth quarter T.D. was equally spectacular as with professional expertise he did not look back for the ball until the last second thus giving the defender little time to react to the slightly underthrown pass.

Shore's final scoring effort a 16 yd field goal came late in the game after it had appeared as though Paul Shugart had pulled the Gaels within a field goal of victory with a catch in the end zone. However the referee who often made himself the focus of rather hostile attention nullified the T.D. with an illegal procedure penalty against the home team.

Gaels were penalized nine times for 120 yards including a very dubious pass interference call against Tim Wardrop who appeared to have made "the perfect defensive play". Gaitors lost 95 yds. through infractions but the timing of the penalties was not as damaging as were those suffered by the Gaels.

It had been expected that the Gaels would be primarily a running team, whereas Bishop's would come out passing. However these roles were reversed as Gaels threw for 176 yds. and ran for 101 and Bishop's gained 111 yds. through the air and an impressive 271 yds. on the ground.

Bishop's offensive line moved very well off the ball and allowed talented halfback Jim Pooler to pick up 118 yds. on 16 carries, including one T.D. Pooler, who attended Chicago Bears (NFL) training camp, had lots of help in the backfield as speedy slotback Cliff McLeod had T.D. run of 53 yds. as well as running a pass for a 40 yd T.D. and fullback Bruce Wilkens carries 13 times for 78 yds. Quarterbacks Neal Greeley and Jim Etcheverry (son of Sam the Rifle) shared the duties for the Gaitors. Both performed well, although Jim hampered by an injury completed only one pass. Gary Carbarino added a T.D. for the Gaitors on a 55 yd. gallop behind a punt return ball. Morgan Quinn completed the Gaitors offensive scoring with a 30 yard field goal, three converts, and single.

Gaitors first two points came as a result of a dubious decision to try to execute two consecutive reverses on kick returns. Needless to say it failed. With just over 15 minutes of football left to play Hargreaves made what appears in retrospect to have been a very grievous error in judgement. Gaels were down by 9 pts. with a 3rd and one near midfield and elected to punt. The snap was poor, Tyczka couldn't control it and was tackled for a big loss and Gaitors took control of the ball deep in Gaels territory and came out with three points.

While one must be encouraged by the offensive show put on by the Gaels, a victory on Saturday was needed as the season is only seven games long and only the top two teams in the division reach the playoffs. Unfortunately, the Gaels play Ottawa twice this season who despite having lost 17 starters from last season's championship, still appear to be very strong. Therefore every game is a must game for the Gaels from here on in, starting with Carleton next week in Ottawa.

Notes

Jim D'Andrea equalled his interceptions total of last year as he started as T.D. drive with a great one-handed grab. Def. end Don Kitchen will undergo examination of ligaments in his left knee injured on Saturday.

X-C retains Guelph crown

The Queen's Cross-Country Gaels captured the Guelph University Invitational Team title for the second straight year, this past Saturday. The Queen's onslaught was led by captain Adam Shoemaker who finished the muddy 4-mile course six seconds behind winner Paul Williams of Guelph.

Following closely in third place was another Queen's sophomore, Claus Rinne, and veteran Bob McCormack, who finished just back in 5th place. The other Queen's counters were Max Barr, who placed

A wise man once noted, "at university there are three types of activities in which one can get involved: sports, socializing and academics, however one can only do two well." Hence, many people have shunned sports. WRONG! The intramural program at Queen's is one of the best in Canada, with over thirty sports in which one can get involved, and these sports do not take up costly studying or socializing time with long practices, so GET INVOLVED! If any first-year students have questions regarding the program, they will be answered at the Recreation Office of the Physical Education centre at 547-6984.

Anybody wishing to officiate any sport, please come and fill out a form at the Rec. Office. The pay is $2.65 per game.

On Tuesday, September 21 there will be a meeting of all convenors in Seminar A of the Phys. Ed. centre at 7:00 p.m. and on Wednesday, September 22, Men's Intramural Athletic Committee will hold its first meeting in the same room at the same time. If anyone cannot attend either of these meetings, someone should be present to represent them.

Finally, on Thursday, September 23 there will be a Monsterball Clinic on the Frank Tindall field behind Victoria Hall at 7:00 p.m. In recent years, there have been some needless injuries in this sport. Hopefully, this clinic will help to eliminate them. Everybody is urged to attend.

student from Western won the race handily.

In 11, prospects seem encouraging for both the men's and women's teams this season. Both Bob McCormack and Claus Rinne ran excellent races in the recent Ontario Games, and both Max Barr and Roger Wheate have competed in marathons over the holidays.

Generally the Cross-Country Gaels are returning in good shape and are looking forward to a highly competitive season.

Rugby Gaels laughing

While the football team had a disappointing start for the new season in Kingston last Saturday, The Queen's two rugby teams were having a field day in Hamilton.

The first fifteen, playing two opponents, found themselves trailing McMaster University by a score of 6-0 after the first ten minutes of play. There were a total of 139 penalties against Queen's during the first half, while only two were called against the "Marauders". Queen's scored a total of five times before Don Johnston put the Gaels on the scoreboard. Gord Nixon followed shortly thereafter with his first of three tries to give Queen's an 8-6 lead at the half. Queen's was ahead to stay from that point on. Additional points were added by John Gibson, Dave Loukes and vice-captain Nigel Costeloe.

injuries in the contest other than John Gibson's broken toe, which unfortunately was on his kicking foot. The final score of the first team game was Queen's-32, McMaster-6.

Queen's second fifteen, exhibiting superb team play, demolished Mac's second team 73-3 in a real defensive battle. Virtually everyone on the team scored, and Drummond MacDougall accounted for a total of 16 points, all of which were tries. Bob Alge did the kicking and accounted for 18 points. David Purdy in his first game for Queen's since his major knee surgery, scored one try and kicked three converts.

Next weekend Queen's will be host to Waterloo University, a team which was quite a challenge in last year's match. Game time is 1:30 p.m. Saturday at Richardson Field, West Campus. There should be good, exciting rugby played.

Main Duck

Main Duck Island, near Kingston, will be sold, subject to the approval of Treasury Board, to Parks Canada.

This island is two and a half miles long and is still in a relatively natural state. It was owned by Robert Hart of South Carolina and was identified in the CORTS report (Canada-Ontario-Rideau-Trent-Severn) as a significance to the Kingston-Quinte area.

This island offers shelter to distressed boats and refuge to waterfowl during migratory periods. Main Duck Island is historically important as a ship graveyard. Rum-runners used the island as a center during prohibition and there was even a fishing village on it for a time. Buffalo and bear were imported by the first owner but they did not survive on the island.

Frosh Week

Ms. Sturges, chairperson of the orientation committee of the AMS, gave a press conference Friday to answer complaints from Kingston residents. She pointed out that the activities residents were complaining about were organized by upper-year students living off-campus. She told of the changes which have been made in the orientation programs to eliminate causes for complaint.

Jay Gandy, a member of the orientation committee, said that the Kingston city police has been co-operative in helping keep off-campus parties under control. Students must realize that the police department will not give them special treatment and that the police assume ultimate responsibility for all incidents in Kingston city.

African Talks

United States Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and South African Prime Minister John Vorster continued their talks in South Africa Saturday as riots and unrest were again present in Johannesburg and Capetown. Vorster is acting as an intermediary in negotiations to end the minority white rule in Rhodesia. Kissinger met the Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith in Pretoria on Saturday to discuss the transition to black majority rule. Major concessions to the black African demands will be made within two years.

During the talks anti-Kissinger demonstrations were taking place in the ghetto of Soweto near Johannesburg. Six schoolchildren were shot and more than 35 wounded in a clash with riot police.

Bilingualism

Air Canada supports bilingualism and is not opposed to the further use of French in the English-oriented airline, but is still against the extended use of French in the air. They are appealing the Sept. ruling by Chief Justice Jules Deschenes that Air Canada must abolish regulations that call for the use of English in all cockpit conversations and that the English training manuals be translated into French. Justice Deschenes rejected a request by the pilots for the use of French in air-ground communications.

Forty-one French-speaking pilots had been using French among themselves during flights until forbidden to do so on April 20.

Air Crash

A British and a Yugoslav plane collided last week after a message from ground control was not understood by the British pilot. After the crash which killed 176 people, five Yugoslavian ground controllers were arrested for not using English in their air-ground communications with the Yugoslav plane. The instructions, given to the Yugoslav pilot in Serbo-Croat, put the plane ona collision course with the British plane. The British pilot would have overheard the instructions but apparently did not understand them as he took no preventative measures to avoid a collision.

Yugoslav ground controllers are supposed to use English in all communications with international flights, but generally use Serbo-Croat with local flights. The Yugoslav plane involved in the crash was on an international run.

Fights disease

Dr. Raj Prasad of the Chemical Control Research Institute has found an inexpensive way to fight Dutch Elm disease. His method costs $25 an application compared to $300 for existing treatments. The chemical Lignasan-p is injected under pressure through rubber tubing into the tree roots and up into the trunk and branches. Annual application to healthy trees would be needed to protect them from the disease.

Legal Breath test

Last Wednesday the use of roadside breath tests for drivers who are suspected of drinking became legal in Ontario and Alberta. New machines for testing are now being acquired and tested in Alberta, but it will be a few months before they will be used in other provinces.

A policeman may now test a driver's breath on an "Alcohol Level Evaluation Roadside Tester" (ALERT) when he only suspects the driver of having been drinking. Before this change in the Criminal Code a policeman needed grounds to ask a person to have a breath test. Policemen will now be able to wait outside a bar, for instance, and demand breath tests from patrons as they leave in their cars.

The machine is 90 percent correct. The only defense one has against these tests is using testers which bars will be able to buy and install on their premises. The fines and jail sentences for refusing the test are the same as those given to proven impaired drivers.

CLC Support

Bernie Helling

Wednesday night saw the first meeting of the co-ordinating committee to support the upcoming October 14 Canadian Labour Congress general strike. The strike is an attempt by Canadian organized labour to effect a full work stoppage across the country, and in the words of Joe Morris, president of the CLC, to hold a "national day of protest". The protest is aimed at the federal government's program of wage and price controls.

Morris has called specifically for "post-secondary student support" and those involved with the organization here on campus have responded, pointing out that the controls and cutbacks have also hurt the student. There are tentative plans for a leaflet and poster campaign stressing the reasons and objectives of the strike, to be emphasised by the strike slogan "All out on Oct. 14th". An information table in the MacKintosh-Corey Building will be in operation for the week of the 14th for the purpose of explaining the strike and the reasons for which student support is required.

The support committee's aim is to effect a closedown of campus facilities on Oct. 14 and the help organize backup support for KLC

(Kingston Labour Congress) which will be holding a protest rally in Confederation Park (in front of city hall). Specifically, Wednesday night's meeting dealt with the forming of various ad hoc groups to serve the main problems of the committee at this time—publicity, organization and funding. As for specific strategy on Oct. 14, most present concurred on the idea of campus pickets, and organized rally on campus and a march on city hall to join the KLC rally. It is hoped that the campus rally will be joined by library, physical plant and hospital workers who will be participating in the strike.

The question of student support and participation is still unsettled. Plans now seem to hinge on whether an AMS Outer Council proposal stands or falls. Last night the Outer Council met to consider a motion that the AMS not support the CLC protest. The motion calls for an AMS vote of non-confidence or non-support of explaining the strike and shutdown. Such a vote of non-support might well hamper efforts of a planned student walkout. Future meetings of the organizing committee are planned for sometime next week.

Caroline Bird, feminist and author, will be making an address at Queen's on October 6.

Colleges "youth ghettos"

Ross Bartlett and Paul Finkel

Today's colleges are "youth ghettos", the students simply "unwanted adults", and the faculty are nothing but "power-hungry academics." So charges Caroline Bird in her book, The Case Against College. She will be speaking at Queen's on October 6 at 8:00p.m. Mrs. Bird is a native of New York, where she resides with her husband and two children. Educated at Vassar College, she holds degrees from the University of Toledo (a BA in American History) and the University of Wisconsin (an MA in Comparative Literature). She is a former member of the editorial staffs of Fortune, New York Journal of Commerce and Newsweek.

A noted feminist, Mrs. Bird is also the author of works such as Born Female: The High Cost of Keeping Women Down, in which she charges that women are "exploited, brainwashed and underprivileged". A subsequent book, Everything A Woman Needs To Know To Get It, What She's Worth, established her as an authority on the economic problems and opportunities of women.

In her diatribe against what she calls the "stranglehold of the academics", she argues that higher education is of little value to the consumer, his or her parents, employers or society and learning in general. According to Mrs. Bird, you can't demonstrate the ability to do a job because you have some parchment in your portfolio. Mrs. Bird alleges that colleges and universities presume three things;

- that their graduates make more money and can find better jobs,
- that they teach people to appreciate literature and other forms of information better than those who don't go to school beyond twelfth grade, and
- that society benefits from such post-secondary exercises.

She concludes that if you were a jerk when you went to college, it is likely you'll be a jerk when you get out. Not everyone is enthusiastic about her views. According to University of Denver Chancellor, Maurice Mitchell, Bird's book is "intellectually pornographic".

The problem, Mrs. Bird would contend, centres around the fact that through democratization, society has made college available for most

"A mess" at McGill

MONTREAL (CUP)—The McGill University student centre has been shut down for a month; the first move by a newly appointed trustee in charge of student affairs.

A drastic cost-cutting move which has angered many, was initiated by G. Sam Kingdom. Kingdom was appointed last week after one of two young people. As for community colleges, they are simply a way of keeping the youth occupied, which is cheaper than the armed forces, welfare or prison. In economic terms Mrs. Bird argues, the person who banks the money he otherwise would have spent on four years of university and get a job, will come out financially ahead. For those who don't believe that college and university should be job-oriented Mrs. Bird has a reply. "Liberal arts, is a secular religion and the faculty members are the priests and priestesses."

Mrs. Bird is being presented as part of the buildup to National Students' Day on November 9.

student committees carrying out McGill's suspended student's Society duties decided to disband and stop distribution of essential club and building operation funds.

The defunct committees were set up in December 1975 after the Student's Society constitution was suspended by the Senate at the request of concerned students. The reason for the request was "serious financial and managerial problems."

Though the radio station and newspaper located in the building are being allowed to continue, club executives are hopping mad. McGill's student club drive for funds will be severely curtailed, due to Kingdom's move, which decrees, "The building will be largely closed for general and recreational use to allow a short breathing space to make adequate space and financial arrangements for the clubs." He also intends to conduct inventories and renovations.

According to Larry Black, editor of the McGill DAILY, the Student Society "is in a mess" at McGill. The situation remains tense and unresolved.

Students as foreign aid

Unquestionably the education of underprivileged foreign students at universities in Canada is the most valuable and effective form of foreign aid this country can provide. At the same time these students enrich campus academic and cultural environment. Last May, the Ontario government decided that next year, new foreign students in Ontario will pay $1500 tuition annually.

Given the premise of foreign aid as an aspect of education policy, such aid should be of a regulated, rather than haphazard nature. In this regard the Ontario government may at least be credited with having progressed towards eliminating one major abuse of this foreign aid. A considerable number of students should not be subsidized by the Ontario taxpayers; students from affluent nations have tended to take advantage of comparatively lower tuition fees in Canada rather than attend local universities. This applies especially to Americans who have been faced with rapidly escalating and increasingly unaffordable fees at the private institutions.

For such students, the new Ontario rates scarcely approach the cost of a comparable education at home. Indeed, for them, Ontario's two-tiered fee system would be no less fair than that faced by Canadians attending American (or British) universities.

Yet Dr. Parrott's policy has not necessarily promoted a clearer understanding of the foreign aid aspect of Canadian educational policy. Having neglected to differentiate between affluent students from western nations and their much poorer counterparts from the third world, formulating the new fee raise, the Ontario government has shown itself to be singularly insensitive to what one would have thought to be the main focus, an important aspect of Canadian foreign aid.

One can only urge Dr. Parrott to consider negotiating with the federal government a formula which would subsidize the fees for students from poor countries and thus help ensure the rightful and significant place of university education in the Canadian foreign aid programme.

Perhaps the additional fees collected by Ontario from all foreign students could be used to subsidize, through CIDA, more of those from nations in need.

What will Canadians pay?

The impression one is left with from talking with Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, is that the foreign students are only the first to be affected by the next round of tuition fee increases. Canadian students, too, soon enough face similar fee hikes and it would not be surprising to find tuition for Canadians going up to $1000 or thereabouts for 1977-8.

Tuition fee increases are inevitable if one only considers the rate of inflation. And the indications of a fee hike have been coming through the same time now in this period of government austerity. Undoubtedly the time when the time comes for a general fee hike, will begin debating the merits of having tuition at all. In all likelihood they will point to the systems of other nations where the governments assume nearly all financial responsibility for the free education system, it does not serve the interests of the British student who graduates into a floundering economy produced by inflated government spending.

Improving the OSAP loan program would be the best objective for the student to attend to now, before the tuition goes up. If some of the inequities are eliminated then perhaps, meeting the costs of a fee hike would be, for the student, an easier pill to take.

Registration remarkable

Registration this year processed roughly 10,000 students. When one considers the overwhelming amount of information and materials to be collected, distributed the speed with which one can move through the system is astonishing. Even crushing crowds were, considering the task, processed with remarkable ease.

The annual job of organizing not only registration but all the other tasks of Queen's is accomplished by Ralph Clench. Clench's organizational ability without peer and he is fiercely dedicated to Queen's. Clench and his staff are to be congratulated for once again saving 10,000 people a great deal of time.

Bookstore prices up

helped speed up the entire process.

Book prices have risen an average of ten per cent in the last two years, according to the bookstore manager. Price increases have ranged from a low of 3 per cent to a high of thirty seven per cent.

The bookstore, which is a non-profit business operated by the Engineering Society, carries all required course texts and a wide range of other supplies. Among these supplies are included general interest books which correspond to course material, magazines, cards, posters, wrapping paper, tobacco, candies, clothing and a gift shop which sells everything from jewelry and perfume to chess sets.

"The reason for the stocking of these non-academic supplies," says Mr. Cauchie, "is that the profits derived from these products go towards reducing the price of the text books."

Law conference at Queen's looks at competition laws

Tim Greenwood

From September 7-9 the Queen's Faculty of Law sponsored a conference to discuss the possible revision of Canada's Competition Laws. The Conference held at the Donald Gordon Centre was attended by leaders from business, industry, government, the universities, and consumer sectors, who met to discuss and study a report drawn up by two former Queen's faculty members, Dr. Lawrence Skeoch and Dr. Bruce McDonald.

The report voiced a highly critical opinion of the concept of economic nationalism for Canada, and of the Foreign Investment Review Board established by Trudeau's government. The many recommendations in the report were met with a mixed reaction from the delegates, though there was considerable praise for its "quality and readability." According to Dr. Magnusson, Associate Dean of Law, "It is conceivable that some or even many of the report's recommendations will be accepted by the government at a later date."

It might be noted that the conference provided substantial evidence of the fact that the Donald Gordon Centre is a valuable addition to the Queen's Campus. Several delegates expressed admiration for the facilities and as Dr. Magnusson commented after the conference, "it gives Queen's a real advantage and opportunity in attracting other such students to people of expertise." A subsequent conference to further grapple with the same problems is scheduled for the Spring of 1977 at the University of Toronto.

Charity Day for commies, capes

Patti Ann Trainor

Charity Day saw many enthusiastic Frosh volunteering for jobs such as shoe-shining, painting, cleaning, gardening and even building a breaker along part of the Lake Ontario Shore.

The Commerce Frosh and Bosses and the Nursing Frosh and Capes took part in a new project for Charity Day this past Orientation Week. Approximately 260 students travelled to the R.K. Camp at Eagle Lake, which is 40 miles north of Kingston off of Highway 48. The Commerce and Nursing Frosh had been told to bring a paintbrush as part of their uniform, the reason for which they discovered upon arrival at the summer camp - which is directed by Don Sinclair of the Kingston Y.M.C.A.

The place took on a bright, new look as the Frosh, Bosses and Capes painted cabins, docks and washstands. The Nurses collected donations from Kingston residents to pay for the paint and the camp provided transportation for the volunteers.

According to Gord Crowe, on of the Commerce Orientation Committee, the project was a tremendous success with 200 freshmen participating to improve the summer camp, which many children from Kingston and the surrounding area attend.

Overall, $2,700 was raised by Queen's Frosh for Cystic Fibrosis on Charity Day.

OSAP, Tuition issues recap-

What to expect?

On a cold and blustery winter's day seven months ago, several thousand students rallied in Toronto to protest the McKeough-Henderson report. Chanting slogans such as "We want Bill!", and "Fight, fight, fight - education is right!", they drew Harry Parrott, Ontario's Minister of Colleges and Universities, to the steps, at Queen's Park: to a chorus of boos and caustic remarks which the students were hurling at him, Parrott managed to assure some listeners that tuition fees would not jump to 1000 dollars for the fall of 1976, one of the controversial reports' recommendations.

The fee hike to $1000 was perhaps the most crucial and unfair proposal in the students' eyes. Though the Minister assured the crowd (of which about thirty members were from Queen's) that there would not be such a large increase, there is little doubt that tuition fees in Ontario will be raised for the fall of 1977. Already, foreign students have been saddled with a 150 per cent hike.

There were three other recommendations in the report which have been neither accepted nor rejected by the Ontario government. They proposed an elimination of the student grant portion of the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP), a freeze on the funding of proposed Graduate Programs and a limitation of enrollment growth. It will not be before the spring that the government will announce its decision on the three proposals.

The Toronto rally was organized by the Ontario Federation of Students. Members of the Ontario Federation of Students executive have met with Dr. Parrott several times since January, however the strongest issues dealing with the McKeough-Henderson Report were not discussed at any length. Recently, the OFS' latest campaign has involved postcards. The federation requests all students to sign and mail a postcard to Dr. Parrott requesting the elimination of the arbitrary summer savings requirement from which student awards are calculated and that awards made to students who appeal for additional financial assistance be based on the loan-grant ratio of OSAP. Presently, appeals are awarded in the form of loans only.

The postcard campaign was initiated because of Dr. Parrott's refusal to meet these demands in a meeting last July. Anticipated high summer unemployment rates are the reason for the proposal to eliminate the summer savings requirement. The OFS claims that many students would not be able to afford to go to university in the fall because of disqualification from OSAP assistance.

Dr. Parrott has denied that the OSAP budget has adequate funds to accommodate student appeals for additional assistance. The Minister was accused by OFS researcher Dale Martin of having more funds in his budget than he was telling the students. According to Martin, this year's budget may have a surplus of approximately $10 million. Though the Minister denied the surplus, he did admit to the OFS that any leftover monies would revert to the Provincial treasury, and not to an appeals fund.

A reply from a capitalist pig

Dear Editor

Ordinarily, when an article such as yours ("Canadian Companies exploit the South African economy" (Journal, Sept. 21)) appears in a campus paper, people do not give it the dignity of a reply. Not this time, fellas. Most people recognize your type of article for what it is, but when it is given the guise of a newspaper article, a lot of people unfortunately read the headline, say "Nothing new", and skip over to the unclassifieds. Not this time, fellas.

In one breath, you guys have managed to herald the end of "western imperialism" (never-minding eastern imperialism), suggest that the massacre of black students is a "study of how students can and should take part in a revolutionary struggle", damn the whole of Canada, and accuse the Bank of Montreal of condemning Queen's students to stay out of Kingston and black students, and workers to die under the hands of the South African Government. Whew! And THEN, somehow, you blame it all on capitalism.

Check your facts, guys, and then check your logic. You have accused three Canadian Banks of financing the wholesale murder of black students and workers (what the hell makes you think the South African government is so picky?) To back this up, you quote old loan figures from 1970-72 (actually, you call the loans "gifts" and "contributions") from the banks to the South African government and (get this!) to the South African Iron and Steel Corporation. It is from this that you draw the line to 300 black people being murdered in the last three months.

South Africa has been frowned upon with distaste for years for its racial policies, and in recent months the world has looked on in horror as people in the streets have clashed with riot police, as schoolchildren have been trampled by adults. Let me assure you two that no one, no corporation would have invested in South Africa if they had known that something like recent events was going to take place. The risk involved in lending as much money as they did to a government which is now

(but not then) ready to topple, is as high as to scare investors and lenders away for the rest of this century. Money lent in the past to such governments may be regretted, but there is not, nor can there be, any casual link to recent events.

And yes, there are some Canadian-based corporations in South Africa, but I believe there are also some in Northern Ireland, some in the Middle East, some in certain of the trouble spots in South America. Most have been there for years, providing jobs, providing technology, helping provide a working economy in these countries; and if they have been accused of withdrawing too much money from those areas, then that is a problem, one that both corporations and governments face dealing with developing countries, as well as with all other countries.

Oh, and when you inquired into the makeup of the Queen's Board of Trustees, you neglected to mention that only 46 percent of the trustees are senior corporate officials (and who else is going to advise and "ultimately responsible" for the $1 million business that is Queen's?) percent of the Board members are

sur la

par Maurice Labelle

Il n'y a jamais eu une société sans "histoires cochones" et il n'y a jamais eu une société qui n'a pas exprimé ou enregistré ses fantasmes sexuels dans l'art et la littérature. Prenons comme exemple: le Cantique des Cantiques dans la Bible, le temple du soleil de Konarak en Inde, le Bain Turc d'Ingres, la Vénus de Botticelli, les tableaux de Michel-Ange au Vatican, les oeuvres de Shakespeare.

Les troubles commencent lorsque les puritains confondent l'obscénité avec le sexe, le sexe avec la sensualité, et les rois avec l'art. On a des problèmes aussi lorsqu'on mêle les histoires et les fantasmes avec le vrai monde. Il y a, comme de raison, ceux qui prennent la tâche de nous embrouiller: les pornographes et les annonceurs de la cité. Ils exploitent nos fantasmes pour le profit. Le sexe qu'ils vendent est élastique: c'est à dire qu'il est fait des matières artificielles. Mais leur crime n'est pas dans la concentration de la libido (donc on serait tous des criminels), mais dans la substitution de marchandises frauduleusement authentiques. Il y a des écrivains comme Al Goldstein de Screw qui essaient de changer nos attitudes envers le sexe, en faisant du mot "erotique" un synonyme de "sain" et peut-être de "saint". Ces écrivains et écrivains zélés sont devenus ennemis avec leurs nouvelles doctrines. Peut-être la solution de l'invasion pornographique est de les laisser nous échouer au point de nous ennuyer à mort. Comme Voltaire disait: "Le secret de gens ennuyeux est qu'ils nous valent tout." Des livres pornographiques pas lus et pas vus décourageront leurs créateurs que n'importe quelle législation.

Il y a des gens qui disent qu'ont ne devrait pas supprimer les articles du code criminel concernant la propagation d'articles érotiques. A mon avis, ces lois ne sont pas nécessaires. Tout ce dont on a besoin ce sont les lois existantes contre la fraude et les fausses déclarations. On pourra emprisonner ces "crasseux" de deux façons. Premièrement, parce qu'ils ne donnent pas ce qu'ils promettent et deuxièmement parce qu'ils vendent de la marchandise contrefaite.

La meilleure protection pour nos jeunes est de montrer la différence entre la fantaisie et la réalité, et entre l'art et la vie. On devrait montrer, aussi, que pour vivre, il faut de l'imagination; cette faculté d'imaginer et les travaux d'arts (qui expriment nos fantasmes) élèvent la race humaine au-dessus de la bête. Punir le miroir ou la réflexion de nos idées est ridicule.

La grève

Laval

Les étudiants à l'université Laval sont en danger de perdre leur année scolaire si la grève par 802 professeurs continue pour une ou deux autres semaines, annonce Lanling Kerwin, le recteur de l'institution.

Environ 15,000 étudiants et 1200 employés non enseignants sont affectés par la grève qui a commencé le 7 septembre.

La participation des professeurs dans l'administration de l'université a été la raison principale de la grève.

Les déchets nucléaires
et votre santé

La mort immédiate. La vie raccourcit par le cancer provoqué par la radiation. Des changements génétiques qui pourraient avoir des effets sur les générations subséquentes. Un manque de santé temporaire.

Voilà les effets possibles de plus de 75 millions de gallons intensifs de déchets radio-actifs et 51 millions de pieds cubes extensifs de déchets qui sont maintenant en réserve à neuf emplacements répandus à travers les Etats-Unis.

Un rapport récent par Mason

Willrich, un ancien professeur nucléaire à la Massachusetts Institute of Technology, appelle les déchets radio-actifs, "un péril à santé."

D'après le rapport, au centre principal d'entrepôt à Hanford, Washington, 18écoulements ont eu le résultat de renverser 43,000 gallons de déchets intensifs dans le sol environnant.

Dans un dépôt à Kentucky, contrairement aux prévisions, du plutonium s'alluviona dans les sols voisins.

par Jacques Bouchard

Paris - A la suite d'une proposition de la commission des affaires culturelles, l'Assemblée nationale française devrait adopter, lors de la session d'automne, un projet de loi visant à assurer une plus grande protection à ceux qui achètent des oeuvres d'art en France.

Ce marché des oeuvres d'art est très important, surtout à Paris, où à chaque jour d'importantes transactions sont effectuées, et personne, même des experts, est véritablement à l'abri des faussaires.

C'est pour cette raison que la commission des affaires culturelles a élaboré un texte visant à assurer une protection efficace aux acheteurs de peintures, gravures, sculptures, tapisseries, etc.

En France, selon un rapport de la commission des affaires culturelles, on recense de 7,000 à 8,000 antiquaires, dont 40 pour cent en région parisienne et plus de 10,000 brocanteurs qui desservent une clientèle de plusieurs millions de personnes.

Le célèbre hôtel Drouot à Paris, où les collectionneurs et les amateurs d'oeuvres d'art se rencontrent pour acheter ou vendre, à un chiffre d'affaires annuel de 300 milliards de francs. Cette somme est divisée proportionnellement pour la vente de nouveaux tableaux, pour les antiquités et pour les objets d'usage courant.

Pour assurer une protection efficace aux acheteurs, la commission a donc décidé qu'il était nécessaire de codifier le plus exactement les oeuvres en exigeant que les vendeurs emploient les expressions: "un tableau attribué à l'oeuvre de..." ou "il s'agit de meubles commode Louis XV" ou "d'époque Louis XV" ou de "style Louis XV", etc.

Ainsi, l'acheteur pourra être en mesure de savoir s'il achète une pièce authentique ou une copie. Tous les professionnels devront se conformer à cette nouvelle terminologie.

Par ailleurs, les gravures devront porter obligatoirement un numéro d'ordre avec une indication du tirage total. Les fontes et autres sculptures devront également porter ce numéro, le cachet du fondeur ainsi que la date d'exécution.

En ce qui concerne les tapisseries, seules les oeuvres tissées à la main sur métiers de haute ou de basse lisse, seront reconnues.

Dear Editor:

I find myself shocked, indeed dismayed by the revolutionary implications of some material I find in the Sept. 21 Journal. On the very front page, in addition to a lewd and licentious daguerotype information restricted in civilized nations to the courts is disclosed: "Arson Suspected." Before you brand this fellow, Arson, with whatever heinous crime he has no doubt previously committed, he must be allowed his day in court. If such irresponsibility continues, our just society will become very sick and unjust.

As to the photograph of poor Mr. Moffat, which I note is also prominently displayed on the front page, while I can see that such photographs may inculcate, caution in our local drivers, there is yet need to expose Mr. Moffat's individual plight to the hateful glare of the public eyes.

In the inner pages of your scurrilous publication yet more atrocities reveal themselves. You advertise plant-hanging (P. 6), realizing, it seems, that our sagacious government in its marvelous wisdom has deemed it fit to abolish the ultimate penalty of death by hanging formerly imposed on hapless murderers. Shame, sir! Remember you are an editor. In future, please ensure you edit such grossity out of a once highly-esteemed periodical. I remain, sir, your humble critic,

From JD's desk

Not quite one year ago, at the Biennial Conference on Teaching and Learning, Professor Noam Chomsky gave a provocative and important address on "The University and Society". This was the theme of the Conference, which was sponsored by the Faculty of Arts and Science. Professor Chomsky is a noted linguist who was, and is, an articulate and highly active critic of political life in modern industrial America. Using the Vietnamese War and his personal experiences as a focal point, Chomsky argued that US universities are (both specifically and as institutions within a structure) an integral part of an ongoing "way of life" which they unquestioningly accept and foster. He believes that this is a betrayal of the purpose of education, and he called upon educators to examine both their ideal and actual roles in society.

To paraphrase Whitehead, responsibility lies with those who have the knowledge and the power to alter or affect the course of events. If the university is conceived to be the formal reservoir of knowledge, then its staff is laden with tremendous responsibilities. Freedom, quality, and courage become powerful notions; the extent of their presence determines the degree of "success" of the university. To accuse the institution of having been co-opted is to accuse the particular men and women of not having met their duties. If this is the case, from where will social direction come? Is our society destined to be without conscious direction and guidance by men, and therefore to proceed blindly on its path until it subverts itself by warfare, natural disaster, cultural or physical degradation?

My conclusion is that the educational system is too much a part of the mainstream of our society to be truly and widely useful for pursuing an "education" along the Socratic design (i.e., "the unexamined life is not worth living"). The energy of the university is spent largely for "training" young people in job-related skills. Critical examination of the institutions and activities of our society seems peripheral. The narrowness of the curricula of important departments lends support to this idea. The most important of these would probably be the economics and commerce departments of the major universities, especially Queen's.

And where do we go from here? Back to the problematical questions asked by the men who designed the Biennial Conference on Teaching and Learning: What are the functions of the university? What is the purpose of an undergraduate education?

The male graduate as homemaker

by Jim Klein

Everyone glues their eyes to some distant or not-so-distant goal as a means of keeping their nose to the grindstone. For some the view changes from year to year; for those whose aims remain the same, only the tints change in the range between optimism and sheer panic. My friend Rick, a student (and athlete) at another university, nears his impending graduation in a little more comfort--and, he feels, uncompromised readiness to learn--than most.

Rick's ambition is simple and noble enough. Homemaking appeals to him, he is now engaged, and he can see no better end for himself than the family life of a household that he tends. My several recalled conversations with him on the subject, somewhat paraphrased, resemble an interview--and what at first invited mockery becomes more credible.

He began on the defensive, beating me to the bad joke he was convinced I was about to make (he was right).

"Please don't remark what a fine husband I'd make for some lucky doctor or lawyer, OK?"

The "professional-trip" digs were his most common complaint. "I often hide my plans even though our school has no medical or law faculties. I guess the presumption is that no right-thinking male would consider giving up his 'right' to succeed or bomb out on his own, materially speaking, without the assurance of being well-off and secure. I can't see that there's negative status, if any, in being a professional's husband and staying at home. It's not a rational thing, but I for one wouldn't care to be somehow looked at as somehow being 'cuckholded' by my wife's job."

Wouldn't he like to be 'supported' in the manner to which he has become accustomed?

"Oh God! Here I can understand some frustration with these misconceptions. Sure, no one likes poverty and we all feel some material

If your slate is clean

Gerry Lewarne

Much has been said in the last few months about the racial tensions existing in South Africa and Rhodesia. The general impression that one receives from the news reports is that the governments in Southern Africa are composed of iniquitous white supremacists. However, there is a great deal more to the situation than meets the eye.

The first piece of information you should consider is the history of South Africa and Rhodesia. At the turn of this century, the white South Africans defended their country and became a full nation. They believe that South Africa is their country. Rhodesia was a British colony until 1964. The white Rhodesians separated from Britain. They believe that Rhodesia is their country.

The second piece of information to be considered is the comparative treatment of natives in Canada, Rhodesia and South Africa. In the Northwest Territories, a correction services manual for penal officers which was in use for seven months describes Indians as "lazy, primitive and weak". In general, our attitude towards Indians is one of repugnance. Consequently, as a group, they are treated much as American blacks were treated after the Civil War.

In South Africa, blacks are officially barred from numerous jobs, public places, and housing areas. In Rhodesia, the same situation applies. It appears that the difference between the attitude towards natives in Canada and in Southern Africa is one of formality. In Southern Africa, it is official that blacks are inferior. In

Somebody once said that education is the great freer of men. In Southern Africa, most blacks cannot go to high school. We comfortable Canadians say that this is wrong. Yet in Southern Africa, whites pay most of the taxes (90 percent in Rhodesia). The whites maintain that it costs too much to expand the education system. Naturally the taxpayers don't want their taxes raised. Are we any different in Canada?

Land settlement is another problem. The Rhodesians and the South Africans believe that they own their land. They acquired it in the same way that Canadians and Americans acquired theirs, by pushing the natives off. Unless Canadians are willing to revoke private property rights in Canada, we cannot ask the Rhodesians and the South Africans to give up their land.

There are numerous other forms of discrimination in Southern Africa such as low wages and poor housing. Without too much work you could probably find parallel examples in Canada.

If Henry Kissinger succeeds in his recent act of shuttle diplomacy (I fervently hope that he does), a great deal of change will not be evident right away. All of the problems will take time to correct. Even so, the attitudes of both blacks and whites will change even more slowly. The just society is a long way off in Southern Africa. With time, patience, and the lessening of violence they might get there.

pressures. Yet not caring myself, against these pressures, to get ulcers over money, I hope I wouldn't ask someone else to do it for me."

Making the education or occupation of his spouse totally irrelevant, of course? "Like most everyone else, I'd say so-but in principle only."

In practice? "Hell, having the same level or general field of education improves more than just the after-dinner conversation, you know. I wouldn't, say, want my degree to become a standard foil, in an argument, to my wife's paycheck. Any two people can quarrel, especially in a situation that attracts unwelcome attention and comment. Let's say that if there's a chance of a fight, why leave loaded guns around?"

How does he anticipate the life of a houseperson Rick clearly didn't care for that term, with the same distaste for 'word games' as makes him roll his eyes when described as a 'liberated man'. "I've never minded the domestic-type chores, and I guess I could always keep up with them and with time to spare too." A little less certain here

Children? Here again he became sensitive. "I like kids, that's no sin. I'd like to think of myself changing diapers and warming bottles no matter what, as part of being a true father. This way, besides a few more diapers and bottles, I'd have to take a bigger role in the child's development at home."

Humor comes more easily as he forecasts a new era of domestic diversions. "Oh, afternoon beer-klatches and weekend football games for husbands. I think I'd draw the line at Tupperware stags, though."

And what of all this 'wasted' education? "Sure, no doubt a lot of it will be completely useless, except that it's beat the hell out of the working world for a few years." There will be a return to the labor force, and "you've got to hope that your learning stays with you, if only as increased ability to cope or something like that. And who's to say I won't have the inside track on the study of a whole new generation of neuroses?"

Anyone who can say that with a grin deserves the best of luck.

Plant poison

Dear Editor:

I was amused to read your article in "Odds and Ends" about Cal Kirkham's potato plant growing tomatoes. As any experienced gardener should know, the potato is a close relative of the tomato, and when it produces fruit (which is rarely, the primary method of reproduction being through the "eyes"), they accordingly resemble small tomatoes. Please warn Mr. Kirkham not to eat his "tomatoes"; they are reputed to be mildly poisonous Frosh Week is over - Thanks!

by Kim Sturgess

Frosh Week has come and gone for another year, and, as always, we are faced with the question, "Was all that work worth it?" Most people don't realize the many months of planning and preparation that go into making a successful Frosh Week. And if you Frosh thought that you were tired, getting up early and going to bed late, the Orientation Committees were up much earlier setting up events, and to much later cleaning up after them.

I think that it is appropriate at this time to say a big THANK-YOU to all those who put so much of their time and energy into making Frosh Week such a very great success. To the ASUS committee - Mike MacMillan, Jan Tate, Tom Box, Kathy Van Alstine, and Greg Doyle - congratulations on a superb job. It amazes me how five people can run a programme for two thousand others (gaels included), and not come out with ulcers. The highlight of the week had to be Sobriety; the show was just first rate, and I hope it made those in attendance realize the great talent we have here at Queen's.

To the Engineering Committee—Rob Muddiman (chief FREC), Gary Davis (treasurer) and the seven other members - I have never seen a better organized or more controlled Science Orientation. The engineers even did a bit of "image upgrading" this year by presenting The Great Pecarve to the Science Frosh and their guests. The FRECs and Frosh even wore suits and ties to the performance - truly an impressive show.

To the Commerce Committee - George Thwaites (chairman), Dave Court (chief boss), and the rest of their crew - congratulations; Commerce '80 really seems to be together. What else can I say but what a football team! The Nursing Orientation under Debbie Galichan, Rehab under Nancy Lorch, and Phys Ed under Kevin Whitaker - all these programmes seemed to run successfully as well.

I'd also like to thank Deputy Police Chief Kealey, Principal Watts, Mayor Speal, all the Deans, and especially the Padie, for their co-operation, suggestions, and support. The key to the week is communication and co-operation, and I hope these ends were achieved.

And my special thanks to our committee - Paula Luck, Jay Gandy, Yves Gauthier, and Colleen Mooney

Considering the odds against us when we started, I really think that these people each made a valuable contribution towards the week's success.

My personal answer then to the initial question "Was it worth it?" can only be yes. I only hope that there will always be eager and interested people who are willing to keep Queen's traditions alive through Orientation.

Good Luck to the Class of '80!

Seabed mining threatens Canada

Adapted from "Miner's Voice", United Steelworkers of America, September 9, 1976 by Shelagh Hurley and Joni Blishen

In August, 1973, a strange-looking ship quietly weighed anchor in Philadelphia Harbour and began a deep-sea voyage that was to have immense consequences for the Canadian economy. The decks of the ship were crammed from stem to stern with derricks, cranes and super-secret machinery. Built by billionaire Howard Hughes at a cost of $343 million and dubbed the Glomar Explorer, the vessel's publicly-announced purpose was to recover mineral-rich nodules from the ocean's depths. But then, in March, 1975, the Glomar made headlines around the world when its real purpose was revealed: to raise a sunken Soviet submarine off the floor of the Pacific for study by the CIA.

Some sharp-eyed observers wondered which cover story was covering which. In the long run, Hughes' debut as an ocean miner could prove more strategically vital than decoding the Soviet military secrets allegedly contained in the sunken sub. A wealth of riches will accrue to the company or the country which first perfects the technology of raising the fist-sized nodules which litter the ocean floors. (Ed. Note: The nodules cover millions of acres of ocean floor where, scientists believe, they grow. The metals are precipitated out of solution by some as yet unknown process - which may be biologically based, and may, therefore, allow the nodules to continue to grow indefinitely.)

More than that, the nodules could make the fondest dreams of the Pentagon come true: they could provide the United States military with its own guaranteed supply of such indispensable minerals as nickel, copper, manganese and cobalt. Today, the U.S. is forced to import 82 per cent of its nickel, a like amount of manganese, 77 per cent of its cobalt and 46 per cent of its copper. Much of these imports (with the exception of manganese) come from Canada. Our country's exports of nickel and copper were worth $1.5 billion in 1975, and they meant tens of thousands of jobs in mining, smelting and transportation.

Two of Canada's biggest employers in the metals industry - Inco Ltd. and Noranda Mines of Canada - are already at the forefront of developing the new seabed mining technology. And judging from the money these shrewdly-managed multinationals are investing in their respective consortia (none under $20 million) they mean business.

Mining Difficult

"Seabed mining is no fairytale," says Inco's representative to Ocean Management Inc., John Shaw, "but it's not in the bag, either, by any means. It's all very new and very risky." The big question mark at the moment, Shaw explains, is the technology needed to raise the potato-shaped nodules from the ocean floor at depths as great as 10,000 feet. Shaw is understandably reluctant to divulge many details of his group's mining methods, but it's clear that they involve a strictly capital-intensive operation with no mine workers as we know them today.

Basically, Ocean Management plans to dredge the nodules in a ship similar to the Glomar Explorer by using a 10-inch diameter, thick-walled steel pipe three miles in length. The pipe will be suspended from the recovery vessel and the nodules will be sucked off the ocean floor by a collector head similar to a vacuum cleaner. Once on the recovery ship, the nodules will be transported to a freighter for transport to a land-based refinery. Stretching even the strongest steel pipe through three miles of turbulent ocean depths may seem like science fiction, but the Ocean Management group plans to have its experimental ship operating in the Pacific by next fall. If all goes well, according to Shaw, the first full-scale operation will be onstream by 1982. The nodules will be a bonanza for Inco et al., because their metallic content is far higher than that of the richest grade ore, to be found anywhere in the earth. How will all this affect Canada's vital copper and nickel industry?

"I don't think it will affect it substantially for a long time to come," says Shaw. "It will mainly depend on economics - whether the new recovery method is more or less expensive than the old." However, at least one Canadian mining expert, former Ontario Mining Association president Charles Elliott, sees a cause for concern due to seabed mining.

"One reason for concern is that we don't really know how cheap seabed mining will be. But there are insiders in the industry right now who say the nodule recovery process will be cheaper than land-based mining."

Canada's Future

Four major variables will determine the future of Canada's nickel and copper industry relative to seabed mining: long-term demand, long-term supply, the costs of production of the respective methods, and international law determining jurisdiction of the richest seabed areas which lie in international waters. The latter point is one of the major issues at the Law of the Sea Conference. U.S. mining companies are anxious to start mining the seabed, but the U.S. State Department has so far insisted that the jurisdictional hassles will be resolved first. However, once the Americans start recovering nodules in commercial quantities, Elliott fears, they may place an embargo on imports of nickel and copper, with disastrous consequences for the Canadian industry.

At least one Canadian, New Democratic MP John Rodriguez, has a plan of action which he believes the federal government should pursue promptly. The representative for the Sudbury Basin's Nickel Belt riding, Rodriguez knows that his constituency has the most to lose from seabed mining. The government, he says, should buy out Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd., the only major Canadian producer not already involved in a seabed consortium. Once Falconbridge is included in the federal government's Canadian Development Corporation, it should join one of the existing consortia so that Canada will be on the forefront of seabed developments. The profits from the Falconbridge venture should then be invested in the Sudbury area to compensate for any loss the Basin might suffer as a result of seabed mining.

Any real threat from seabed production is still probably twenty years distant, and if the Canadian government wakes up to the long term problems, damage to our economy can be minimized. But we remain complacent for too long. The August, 1973 voyage of the Glomar Explorer may some day be recognized as the beginning of the end for Canada's billion-dollar-per-year copper and nickel industry.

Le Jour folds up; Pequistes is strong

by Alan Conter

MONTREAL (CUP)—After struggling for two and one half years to survive, Le Jour died this month - the end of a bold and costly experiment to create an "independantiste" daily newspaper in Quebec. No doubt the hockey fans in Toronto will take comfort in this fact, and the provincial Liberal Party will attempt to convince us that the death of Le Jour is in some ways indicative of the Parti Quebecois' weakness. It will be interesting to see how much political mileage various groups will try to derive from what is, after all, a rather uneventful occurrence; it will be interesting to see just how far people will go in equating the folding of a newspaper with the health of a political movement.

Le Jour was founded early in 1974 by the Parti Quebecois to fill what was felt to be a serious void in Quebec journalism. Of all the daily newspapers in the province not one supported the "independantiste" option, yet a third of the population had voted "pequiste" in the 1973 election. Le Devoir had been the most sympathetic to the proposals of the Parti Quebecois. However, editor Claude Ryan, in a series of editorials just prior to the election, outlined his reasons for considering the Parti Quebecois ill-equipped to form a government in the Assemblée Nationale, adding almost as a postscript that the time had not yet come to abandon the prospects of reworking the constitution in a manner suitable to the aspirations of the Quebecois. If that was the best that could be hoped for from the established press in promoting the positions of the Parti Quebecois then it seemed not unreasonable to at least attempt to establish a newspaper that would reflect the philosophy of the party which now formed Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the provincial legislature.

Ownership of a newspaper was certainly nothing new in the history of Canadian political parties, and overt unashamed control was "de rigueur" well into this century; and, for those who have the patience, a careful examination of the corporate links of the major newspaper chains will still reveal a rather "cosy" arrangement between them and the major political parties. The Parti Quebecois' entry into the field of journalism through the creation and partial ownership of a newspaper was by no means out of line.

The paper started out with a rather rosy beginning. It attracted top-flight journalists from Le Devoir, La Presse and even from the bastion of English Montreal, The Montreal Star. The editor-in-chief was Yves Michaud who had failed to win a seat in the last election, and the paper received regular editorial contributions from Jacques Parizeau, professor of economics at the Université de Montreal, former economic consultant to federal and provincial agencies, and economic wiz of the party.

The editorial staff were certainly experienced at running a paper. The paper was set up under a corporation in which the Parti Quebecois held only partial control of the shares, the rest being held by the public at large.

Le Jour was heralded as a co-operative effort by free thinking "independantistes", and was to be a model of democratic journalism. Levesque, Parizeau and Michaud assured the public that the journalists at Le Jour would be free to criticize whatever they thought ought to be criticized, including the Parti Quebecois. To make sure that such journalistic freedom was maintained a structure was created within the paper calling for full employee participation in the editorial decision-making process. Initially it seemed to work. During the first half of 1974, despite the kinks that plague any new endeavor Le Jour maintained an average daily circulation of about 40,000 drawing most of its readers away from Le Devoir.

There was even talk that summer that if Le Jour continued to prove such a stiff competitor to Le Devoir, Le Devoir's circulation might drop below the 30,000 mark, spelling financial disaster.

Yet it was Le Jour that was soon in trouble, first financially and then in conflicts between the editorial board and the journalists. Though the paper was drawing the readership, it was unable to attract a sufficient number of advertisers.

On one level there was the substantial degree of federal government advertising dollars that was prohibited by Trudeau Government policy from finding its way to Le Jour, the provincial government had adopted a similar stance but gradually abandoned it. Newspapers across Canada accused the Trudeau Government of misusing public advertising dollars in singling out Le Jour in its boycott and in a rare show of solidarity supported the claims of Le Jour to an equal share of the pie.

Yet Le Jour's major advertising dollar problem came from another level, the failure to attract enough small advertisers at a time when ad money was in short supply and the city was saturated with six major dailies serving a population of just two and a half million people.

The paper was forced to turn to its readership for additional support simply to keep above water. "Les amis du Jour" campaigns were often launched province-wide, and it fell upon the individual members of the Parti Quebecois to launch, manage and contribute to the campaigns.

Though the campaigns always met

By August of 1976, when the paper was once again in financial straits, it was decided to close up shop. With rumours of an upcoming provincial election the Party could not afford to expend its energies bailing out a newspaper that now tended to be a divisive factor within the "independantiste" camp instead of being the rallying point of the movement. Therefore, the Parti Quebecois pulled out.

Le Jour and Party Popularity

This decision is probably for the best. The Parti Quebecois has never ranked so high as it does now in the public opinion polls, and the paper seemed only to be a liability on the resources of the Parti.

In the fairy-tale attempt to combine the interests of the political organization with the ideal of a democratically run newspaper, a situation was created that invited the journalists at Le Jour to constantly reassert their independence from official party policy. In the long run constant criticism of party policy où nous serons maîtres chez nous

their objectives it was thought that this was an impossible way to run a paper. Had the paper served the party in the manner it had been intended to, Le Jour might have trudged on in this fashion, but the paper was not serving the party.

Because of its very nature as an "independantiste" journal Le Jour focused its attention, rather myopically, on the political centre of "independantisme" - The Parti Quebecois. Thus the P.Q. was as often as not the target of Le Jour's journalists, who seemed determined to wave the party's dirty laundry in the face of the public.

The party was not amused - or at least Levesque, Parizeau, and Michaud weren't. They felt that the paper was becoming a platform on which to wage an ideological battle between the party's "left-wing" and the centrist group led by party leader Levesque.

might have proved a grave disservice to the well-being of the "pequistes". In the short run it led to journalistic nit-picking, and what could be more boring - even if offered up in tabloid format?

That Le Jour is dead means simply that, the paper is dead, no more. That the problems Le Jour revealed within the party will continue to plague the party must also be accepted; but the problems were there before Le Jour, and were never to be resolved within Le Jour, they are problems similar to those that beset any other party in Quebec and Canada, and are rightly to be settled at the next Congrès du Parti Quebecois.

For the moment the Parti Quebecois is apparently quite well and will probably survive the failure of this experiment. After all, the Liberals seemed to have had a great number of failed experiments, and they are still around.

In our first column last week we told you a little bit about what CFRC is all about and indicated that this column will be appearing every Friday in the Journal. This week we are going to do a quick run-through of the winter programming schedule, but first it should be pointed out that this weekend we are still on the more limited summer schedule. Full AM-FM programming begins next Thursday, September 30.

The CFRC programming schedule is extremely varied and in the past, people have often mentioned that they never know what to expect when they tune their radios to 1490 AM or 91.9 FM. Depending on how you look at it, this may be good or bad, interesting or frustrating. We do believe that we have something for everyone, and that most people enjoy more than one form of music and discussion. However, so that you will know exactly what to expect and when to expect it, CFRC publishes a comprehensive guide. These can be picked up in the basement of Caruthers Hall during normal business hours. You could also phone (547-6677) or write the station and have a copy sent to you free of charge.

Today's column cannot replace that programming guide but will hopefully give you a glimpse of what we are trying to do.

Popular and easy listening music (incorporating softer rock, jazz and folk) can be heard Thursdays and Fridays from 6:30 till 8 p.m., Saturday from noon till 4 p.m. and Sundays from 8 a.m. till noon, all on CFRC AM 1490. Folk programmes are heard every evening on CFRC AM from 8:30 till 10 p.m., except Sundays 9 till 10 p.m. As well Saturday Song Train is heard from 4 till 5 p.m. on AM, after football season is over (CFRC carries all Golden Gael home and away games). Each of these folk shows has a different theme and format. Besides broadcasting all the football and many of the hockey games, Sport '76 comes your way Thursday at 8 p.m., with in-depth coverage and commentary on both amateur and professional sports.

Late night on CFRC means Rock in all its forms, from 10 p.m. till midnight on AM and midnight till 2 a.m. on both AM and FM. For nighthawks there is the Nocturne request show every Sunday morning from 2 till 5 a.m.

Jazz is heard each evening from 10 p.m. till midnight on FM. Each programme has a specific format, ranging from the experimental and avant-garde on Thursdays to the traditional and big band jazz heard every Sunday evening.

It is hardest to summarize our many classical offerings, as there are so many, at different times, with varied purposes. These include Keyboard Concert, Thursday 6:30-8 p.m., Canadian Concert, Friday 6:30-8 p.m., Masterworks from 8 till 10 p.m. on Friday, and Musical Panorama from 8 a.m. till noon, Sundays. All the above classical shows are heard on FM. Finally there is the perennially popular Classics by Request on both stations, noon till 3 p.m. every Sunday.

That roughly summarizes all of the music at CFRC, but of course there are many spoken programmes as well. These include tales of mystery on Skeletons in the Closet, heard at 7:30 p.m. Thursdays on FM, and Theatre of the Mind, featuring stories by Edgar Allan Poe, every Friday at 7:30 on FM, 91.9. Overview brings you discussion on topics of interest to Queen's and Kingston, on CFRC AM Saturdays. Compendium offers something for all ages, Sunday at 3 p.m. and finally there is Sunday Commentary, at 7:30 on FM, bringing you penetrating editorials and interviews.

Although there is more, what we have presented here should be an indication that CFRC truly does have something for everyone. Tune in Thursdays through Sundays and find out for yourself.

Arts Opinion

Will all illegal actors please stand up?

by Liz Wood

An article in Wednesday's Globe and Mail on the subject of illegal immigrants and their terrors and hardships reminded me that there are some Canadians I have heard of who share a similar plight in this nation. They too, desperately wish to be domiciled in Canada and recognized as legitimate proponents of their culture. They are the people in the arts.

I would not consider for a moment belittling the tragic predicament of those immigrants exploited by their own countrymen and ours, but a reminder is a reminder all the same. Remember the government amnesty program from a while back? If illegal residents would come forward, and were of sound body and mind, the government would let them stay and free them from extortion, fear, and low wages.

Well, what if, for example, the CBC were to try the same thing? All able actors, writers, musicians et al would come forward and be put to proper use. Last year the CBC couldn't find a Canadian actress it considered qualified to play the lead in its dramatization of the life of Canadian suffragette Nellie McClung. This new method might have helped them out quite a bit.

There is of course a flaw in the analogy. Illegal immigrants have no where else to go. They are, in a word, stuck. But people in the performing arts have got some place else to go, and many are already gone.

Although there is some fine and famous work done in Canada, it sometimes seems to be a wonder, since there is not yet the industry or promotion to really produce quality and quantity. Each of us knows the names of a few famous Canadian actors and musicians who live and work as respected executives of their crafts, in the U.S. and Britain. There's more behind the scenes though. While we lament the lack of good home-produced movies and television, both serious and of a lighter nature, Canadian writers, producers and directors help turn out many movies and such shows as Laugh-In, Sonny and Cher, Saturday Night, and a few MTM productions. Meanwhile, Canadian artist and filmmaker Joyce Wieland is taking four years to produce The Far Shore at home because of funding problems.

The list could go on and on. Why did Jean Sutherland Boggs resign the Directorship of the National Gallery in Ottawa? Was it to pursue a teaching and research career - the official reason, or because of a building fiasco? Why does Jack Bush, the painter, enjoy so much more success abroad than at home?

Ah... and then there's Pop. Where is Joni Mitchell? Where are many others we could name? (Don't say never mind Virginia, we still have Ronnie Hawkins). Everyone tours the States, makes money in the States, but does nearly everyone have to move to the States? The answer - yes - to be near their recording studios, agents, and peers. That is it. To be near the action. It applies to the actors as well. And to the writers and technicians. Many of them couldn't make it happen here so they've gone to the mountain.

Sweden, a much smaller country with a population similar to ours, has I'm told, a popular practical car named the Volvo. I don't know if a Bricklin will last ten years on the road, and I bet I'll never find out.

Nationalism of course, can be a disease, contagious and dangerous, one which ultimately produces chaos and insanity. But the use and promotion of domestic talent in many fields need not have such drastic results. And like restricted drugs, if not abused but taken in prescribed doses by the user, it can restore health and in some cases preserve life.

Let's hope it may someday happen that the CBC, among others has to post a sign "No restricted actors stored in this building". Because people are already breaking in and stealing them.

Agnes Etherington Arts Centre

An introduction to Queen's art gallery

by Madeline Mills

On the corner of Queen's Crescent and University Avenue, across from the clock tower there is an art gallery. The entrance is directly across from Jeffery Hall. This centre is for everyone, and almost everything is free. It's a wonderful place to pop in and out of periodically. If you have half an hour before the next class you can just walk in and browse.

Agnes Etherington donated the building, formerly her house, to Queen's as a gallery. Some of the old rooms and furniture are gorgeous, so if you are interested in antiques you'll love it. The gallery's permanent collection, which is always on display, includes some original paintings by the group of Seven as well as many others.

Right now there are three special exhibitions. Decline and Fall, a show depicting Kingston's architectural heritage with photos and artifacts, is one of them. The Open Studio, a show from Toronto, is a series of interesting prints which vary from the modern and bizarre to the simple and pretty. The Jeffery Childs exhibit consists of solid modern geometrical sculptures and paintings.

This is your gallery. Pop in, pick up a bulletin and browse. The building is open Monday through Friday from 9 am to 5 pm, Saturdays and Sundays from 1 pm to 5 pm., and Tuesday and Thursday evenings from 7:00 to 9:00.

Calendars listing times and dates of shows, films and talks can be picked up just inside the door of the gallery.

Membership allows you reduced rates, tours to other galleries, bulletins in the mail and invitations to openings and speakers.

Student Print Rental means you can pick up nicely framed prints of Great Masters for $2.00 for the year.

Put down $7 on each print, and receive $5 back when you return it. The prints are on display now, and can be rented as of 7:30 Tuesday night (September 29).

The Art History Library has moved to Ontario Hall.

Soccer Gaels start strong

by Gary Harvey

The Queen's soccer team opened their competitive season last Wednesday afternoon with a convincing 5-1 exhibition win over Royal Military College Redmen. The Gaels thoroughly dominated the match and goalkeeper Blair Howkins had a rather easy time of it.

The lone goal that spoiled his shutout resulted from a hazardous crosswind that held the ball up just long enough for a Redmen forward to reach it and bang it home for a goal. At the time the Gaels held a 2-0 lead on two early goals by Pete Hill and Jacques Shapiro. Both scores were the result of fine passes chipped back towards the awaiting players.

The score remained 2-1 for the Gaels until several minutes into the second half when Shapiro picked up his second goal on a rebound in front of the net. Queen's continued to utilize a good low passing game, pushing the ball to the wings and then crossing it back in front of the net. Andy Goodman put the icing on the cake for the Gaels as he scored a pair of late goals on a couple of pinpoint passes from Mark Bennett on the right wing.

Professor John Walker has been the soccer coach at Queen's for many years but is now on sabbatical and Don Barager, a graduate of last year's team, has taken over the coaching role. Don believes a fit player is a happy one (or vice versa), so the squad should be in good shape. Several excellent players from previous years' teams have returned to help bolster the lineup of the 1975 Ontario Universities' Athletics Association championship team, which has a nucleus of eight players returning from last year.

The Gaels, who will face a little tougher competition this weekend in

by Brian Clarke

"The day we're not out to win is the time for us to become intramural."

These were the words first-year Queen's University Golden Gaels basketball coach Percival O. Smith addressed to all the candidates who attended the team's first meeting Tuesday night.

Smith, who has taken over from former coach Barry O'Connor and assistant Bruce Black, has one major ambition in life right now - to give Queen's a winning basketball team.

After listening to his voice he may just be the one to do it.

Tuesday, Smith called together all the players who have been practicing in the hope of being chosen to play on this year's basketball team. He wanted to explain his position to them and as he put it "listen to their suggestions."

Queen's begins league play on November 5th against Laurentian, but it has scheduled several exhibition matches before that. To be ready for these games Smith told the candidates Tuesday that all player cuts would be made by Monday.

"We have to put something together which resembles a team," said Smith. "It matters not win or lose but how you play the game."

Smith has a lot of thinking to do between now and the deadline he has set for choosing his team. Almost three dozen candidates have been trying out for the Gaels and he has to trim this number to 15.

To make the best possible choices Smith has requested that all the candidates show up for practices six days this week, Monday through Saturday.

"I have been very pleased with what I have seen in the gym so far," said Smith. "It's going to be hard to make the cuts."

"I don't want good material to go to waste. The players who aren't picked to the team I would like to organize into two other teams which would play in the Kingston City Basketball League. Then they would still be around for next year."

Smith seems to possess, more than anybody around the Limestone City, the three qualities which he says go into making a good basketball player. They are: enthusiasm, experience, and confidence.

Few will doubt that he is enthusiastic when they come to hear the set of rules by which he intends to coach this year's Gaels.

He is a non-smoker and a non-drinker and candidly acknowledges that he will frown on either of these activities by his players.

However, he is a strong supporter of team unity and spirit. "I want everybody to help each other on this team - there is absolutely no room for cliques or the like."

Smith has the rare look about him that few basketball coaches have which characterizes him as experienced. You can tell from a glance that he has coached for several years in universities and colleges. And so he has.

At present his home is Henderson, New York. He has just finished assisting with basketball at Potsdam University and at Oswego State University. Once he even coached a semi-pro team from Puerto Rico.

Confidence plays an important role in Smith's assessment of basketball today. In fact, Tuesday, Smith circulated copies of two articles about the game which he had written, "Individual Offensive Skills in Basketball: How We Got Where We Are Today", and "The Complete Basketball Player".

"I have confidence in players who have confidence in themselves," said Smith. "You have to be cocky to be a good player."

Smith makes no excuses for his attitudes "We are here to win - like it or not. Life is competitive and you have to face up to it."

If Smith sounds like he is adopting a spartan approach it may not be too uncharacteristic. Buried in among his other qualifications for his new job are 28 months of service with the United States Army, 12 in combat duty.

Tennis team victorious

The 1976 edition of the Queen's tennis team picked up a 5-4 dual meet victory over St. Lawrence University of Potsdam, N.Y., at Queen's Richardson Stadium courts on Tuesday night. This weekend the team travels to the York University Invitational tournament before hosting the OUAA Eastern Section Tournament next Friday and Saturday.

Queen's is led by four year veteran Stewart Watt, who won a tight match, 7-5, 6-4 over Don Lenci of St. Lawrence in the no. 2 singles position. At present, Watt's former no. 1 position has been taken over by freshman Davie Stauble, who comes to Queen's after a year at Texas Christian University in the U.S. Stauble was defeated 3-6, 6-4, 6-3, by Chuck Schnitzlein on Tuesday night.

At the no. 3 position, another freshman, Ian Dolphin of Kingston, dropped a 6-4, 6-4 decision, but teamed with Pat Galey to edge out the deciding doubles match in a 10-8 pro set over Tom Byrne and George Hamilton Galey, displaced this year from no. 3 to no. 4, had earlier handled Byrne 6-3, 6-1 in his singles match.

Other Queen's points were earned by Tom Larsen and Steve Bernstein, who collected singles wins in their no. 5 and no. 6 positions respectively. The two are squeezed out 10-9 in their doubles match.

With the addition of Stauble and Dolphin, Queen's appears ready to challenge last year's OUAA champions, York, who have been weakened by the graduation of their top player, Tony Pospisil in the Eastern Section of the OUAA. Queen's will also have to cope with the perennially strong U of T, while only Western of the other universities appears a serious contender.

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble - a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology - our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Prior to on-campus interviews, representatives from Marketing, Finance, and Sales will be visiting your campus to answer questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Specific date, place and time will be advertised soon in this newspaper and at your placement office. The visit will be a one-day informal session in which all interested students can learn more about career opportunities in business management at Procter & Gamble.

As a first step, we invite you to visit your placement office and obtain a copy of our literature. Additional information is also available in the library file in the placement office.

Canada Cup Hockey

Notes and memories

In the aftermath of the Canada Cup Hockey Tournament the media has been filled with comments, pro and con, on various aspects of this international sports event. As a dedicated hockey fan and a reporter in my own right, I feel a pressing need to add my own name to a growing list of sports and political analysts who have tackled this obsession.

The scores and scorers from this series need not be reviewed for they have been recorded but will be forgotten long before the feelings and commentary generated by the series will die down.

For me Canada Cup came as close to being the "perfect international series" as is possible, at least for Canadians. All the elements which make hockey a great game were present and besides that the best team won. Remember that, hockey fans. Not because it proves that our so-called system is superior to any other, because the Olympics proved

by Betti Stamps

WIC's first meeting of the year, held last Tuesday night, was a great success, with first and upper year students out in full force.

Activities are now starting Monday evening, and basketball and an officials clinic on Tuesday night. Field hockey starts on Wednesday with a clinic from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m. for beginners.

Something special begins Thursday night when flag football kicks off

The law students are reputed to have a super team and are looking for some good competition.

Golf is being offered by WIC for the first time this year. To compete in the tournaments on October 1st at the Amherstview Golf and Country Club you must register by September 27th.

If you are interested in these or other WIC sports check a calendar or for further information phone 549-2976 or 547-5939.

Through Canada Cup and with special assistance from the fans in Hogtown, les Anglais also learned a lesson in bilingualism the hard way in front of 200 million viewers around the world. I am sure the folks in Sweden must have been confused to see fans screaming in support of such Canadians as Lafleur, Perreault, and Potvin then booing when the announcements of their accomplishments were made in French. All the Gardens needs is another Roger Dussset and a Dutchie to replace the "Export A" cheerleader (ie. Go Leafs Go...) and their anemic organ.

Sportsmanship and camaraderie. Who would've ever guessed we'd ever see the Forum fans (Montreal) give Martin (Buffalo) and Sittler (Toronto) a standing ovation for helping the Canadiens' regular season nemesis Bobby Clarke (Phi) off the ice? And what about the 5-minute applause awarded to Bobby Orr in Toronto? That had to be as good for hockey as was the overwhelming success of Team Canada without gaining even one major penalty.

Canada Cup served to remind us that hockey at its best is played by people with real personalities, not by glamour-boy superstars and "mad dogs". The spark, dormant since the Olympic closing ceremonies, was rekindled in the hearts of many in the exchange of sweaters between Dzurilla and Vachon, the Czech and Canadian goaltenders. In those touching moments the two men, did as much for Czech-Canadian relations as any ambassador could do in a lifetime. Now, if only the Russian players were allowed to smile a la Dzurilla it would make for a much friendlier atmosphere. The Soviets had their usual wide array of complaints and excuses but I feel that their problem not ours, for this series was designed so that it could be as great as the participating countries wanted it to be, as it turned out only the Soviets put a damper on its spirit. Soviets were almost friendlier in the politically oriented blood-and-guts series in 1972.

Blights for the viewer. I feel fortunate to have caught the spirit of Canada's first two games in the Canada Cup unadulterated by grossly biased commentary. Howard Johnston's on St. Catherine St. with its 7 by 7-foot screen with the CBC French Network (and a couple of Bradors) and the Forum both were filled with electric atmospheres in the expectation of seeing the best in hockey do their thing. Despite the fact that these two matches were Canada's easiest it was nice to be able to enjoy hockey without having to listen to Tom Watt or Alan Eagleson tell me why Canada is good and others are evil. With ten million Canadians viewing in, this is not the type of people who should be given the power to influence Canada's youth as well as those who should know better than to listen to them. Hopefully the presence, comments and contribution of such people as Ken Dryden and Sam Pollock served to counteract the other misguided "boob-tube ambassadors".

The hockey was tremendous. The mark of a great goaltender is being able to make the key saves when it counts in pressure situations. Dzurilla, LaProeste (U.S.), and Tretiak (U.S.S.R.) more than met this prerequisite. Vachon proved that he truly belongs in the upper echelon of the goaltending profession, where he joins the ranks of Dryden and Parent. Gilbert Perreault was breathtaking in the grace of his moves whereas Bobby Hull brought back memories of the Golden Jet of old with his awesome power. Orr and B.J. Salminger were masterful in their control of their respective teams. However, the true champions on the winning squad were men such as Gainey and Sittler whose vocabularies do not include the word "quit". Behind all these men were the masterminds who organized these powerhouses with Sam Pollock being the unchallenged master of them all.

It is hard for me to believe that Canada has just finished hosting the "perfect hockey tournament" complete with an over-time playoff victory, and yet many of those in a position to congratulate those responsible have done nothing but criticize. I feel sorry for them, they've missed a good tourney.

Wiretapping

Conversations between lawyers and their clients were tapped by the RCMP while they were gathering evidence against lawyer Frank Shunock, convicted a week ago on five criminal charges. The Ontario Attorney-General, Roy McMurtry, would like the tapes voluntarily destroyed by the RCMP. The tapes of conversations by lawyers on phones in Sault Ste. Marie courthouse, are regarded by McMurtry as an infringement on the confidentiality of the lawyer-client relationship.

The wiretaps were legally authorized by a Sudbury district court judge. He recalled that the RCMP request for wiretapping permission gave only the names of people whose numbers would be tapped, not the location of the phones. The police could now use the tapes to aid in finding evidence against people not involved in the Shunock case. They do not need to notify the lawyer or the client of the information they had accidentally obtained.

Shunock, a Sault Ste. Marie lawyer, pleaded guilty to trafficking in the narcotic PCP, hashish oil and attempting to obstruct justice.

Armed Forces

Canada's armed forces are the laughing-stock of the world according to Lt. Colonel Michael A. Stevenson of the Royal Canadian Armored Corps Association. He places the major blame for the situation on the lack of government policy. Col Stevenson claimed that sources at defence headquarters said that there is no mobilization plan on paper. Also, in his eight years with the Canadian army he has never seen anything on paper for even national emergency operations.

He pointed out that last summer, normally a heavy training period for the reserves, the reserve air force only had one twin engine Otter while the government had approved to loan to Burma for the purpose of six Otters. There were no tanks for training purposes except in New Brunswick and the tanks they do have are obsolete.

In January of this year, General Dextrase, Chief of Defense Staff, said that several military bases must be closed if $50 million was not found to purchase military equipment. In July the government indefinitely postponed any such move.

Major Allan Dittle, senior information officer for the Defense Department of Ontario, said that in his opinion Colonel Stevenson's claims are not valid. He blames many of the problems on a budget squeeze and noted that the Olympics cut into much of the reserve training this summer. He added that most of Col. Stevenson's claims were true until a major policy change three years ago. Maj. Dittle gave as an example of this change the reorganization and beefing up of the air reserves.

Info Bill

The Ontario Progressive Conservative party has backed a provincial government decision to introduce a freedom-of-information bill. At a meeting of the party in May, 68 percent voted in favour of such a motion. Only 13 percent voted against and 19 percent either gave no opinion or did not answer. The minority government has decided to introduce the bill with a good probability it will be introduced in the fall session of the legislature.

Loblaws broke?

On Monday September 20, Loblaws Ltd was fined $100, the maximum fine for the first offence for selling decayed food. A lawyer for the corporation obtained permission to delay payment of the fine by Loblaws for 2 weeks.

A provincial agricultural official testified that up to 35 percent of produce samples taken from a Loblaws supermarket in Toronto showed signs of decay. Hundreds of apples, tomatoes, and cucumbers selected from the store last February exhibited skin punctures, softness and decay.

Killer Chlorine

Chlorine in Toronto's water could be a serious killer according to Anthony O'Donohue, chairman of Toronto's works committee. Long-term exposure to chlorine in water may be a major factor in premature aging, strokes, hardening of the arteries and heart attacks. Mr. O'Donohue would like the use of chlorine as a water purifier phased out and replaced by ultraviolet light or ozone purifying systems.

Chlorination of Toronto's water supply first began in 1910 after a typhoid outbreak that had lasted for nearly 30 years. Now Toronto is using 500 tons of Chlorine a year to purify the 100 billion gallons of water used by Toronto and surrounding boroughs.

Cancer Clinic

A new clinic specializing in breast cancer screening has opened at Kingston General Hospital. Thermography, mammography and clinical examinations will be given there to detect the presence of breast cancer. Thermograms are maps of heat patterns made with infra-red sensitive cameras. Mammograms are breast X-rays.

High-risk patients under forty years of age will be given a thermogram once a year. Older patients may receive one as often as every six months. Women must be referred to this clinic by their family doctors, but they will be accepted if they do not have a doctor. The clinic will be held every second Thursday morning. When demand increases the hours will be expanded.

Joyceville

Joyceville has not exactly been a quiet place over the past few weeks. Three escapes, a stabbing incident and a brawl among inmates high on drugs have recently taken place, but prison officials say everything remains normal and tension is non-existent.

One of the escaped inmates has been recaptured, but the other two remain at large. The stabbing incident was an "isolated case" according to staff. One prisoner was stabbed by another as he was taking a shower.

Drug smuggling into the prison happens on a fairly organized basis.

Eighteen of the inmates involved in last Saturday's brawl were taken to the regional receptional center located at the Kingston Penitentiary. They were all high and some had wounded themselves with weapons such as razor blades. Others were already psychiatric cases and under special care. Fortunately little damage resulted to either the staff or the inmates during the brawl. The men involved will probably be moved away from Joyceville.

Parks Canada

Parks Canada has bought two small islands called the Leeward Islands. They form part of the thousand islands and will now become part of the St. Lawrence Islands National Park. Sixty acres of Hay Island were also acquired by Parks Canada as well as one acre of McDonald Island. Parks Canada is the owner of more than twenty islands and over eighty rocky shoals.

The Thousand Islands Area Residents Association (TIARA) opposes the expansion plans of Parks Canada. Tiara is researching the affair and plans to publish a report next month. The organization is comprised of 1,700 members who are concerned about preserving the character of the thousand islands.

Grad Club

Graduate students at Queen's should be able to enjoy their new club on Halloween night. The old club at 151 King Street was sold last summer when management difficulties and increased costs forced its closure. The new house, at 162 Barrie Street, should prove very satisfactory. Oak panelling and beautiful staircases plus a professional bar manager working full time should help the club to success.

Membership will only be offered to graduate students, although guests may be signed in. The chief object of the house is to provide a quiet area for informal meetings, and it will be run in the traditional style of a faculty club.

Bits & Bobs

Flies within one hundred yards of student Allan King should not stop to flirt with the opposite sex. Mr. King's deadly accuracy could cut short the most seductive advances; he has never yet missed a fly-sized target at a rifle competition, even those one hundred yards away.

Drinkers in an English inn had good reason to chug their pint of bitters last Monday. A bull clambered onto the inn roof which promptly caved in, letting the animal down to join the action.

Grease, dirt, rubbish where they should not have been were the reason the owner of Wimpy's here had a fifty dollar fine to pay. The restaurant is now closed.

Literacy levels low

Literacy levels among undergraduates at this university are disturbingly low, Dr. Colin Norman's report "The Queen's English" revealed recently. Final examination papers of 800 students were tested in the study that claims a large percentage of first year students write less than adequately.

Queen's English suffers among undergrads here

by Denis Champagne

The results of a study conducted at Queen's University were released Friday revealing "disturbingly" low levels of literacy among undergraduates in general arts and science programs at the university.

Funded by a $6,000 grant from the Ontario Universities Program for Instructional Development, the study, conducted by Queen's Professor, Dr. Colin J. Norman, appeared in a published 106-page report entitled "The Queen's English". Eight hundred undergraduates were tested in 1975-76.

Final examination papers at first, third and fourth year levels from various disciplines in the Faculty of Arts and Science were graded for "style, organization and other indications of writing ability", by Dr. Norman, his assistant Stella Wynne-Edwards and in a number of cases by

Among first year students, according to the report, some 500 or 34 percent wrote either badly or poorly; another 37.2 percent wrote less than adequately but had the potential for improvement. However, 75 percent of graduating fourth year honors students were judged to have written well and were "impressive, and probably as good or better than ever."

To round out the picture, Dr. Norman circulated questionnaires to first year students and faculty members at Queens.

Students complained about little or no training in grammar and composition. Faculty responses to questionnaires also indicated a substantial concern about the deficiencies of first year students in terms of "ability to read with intelligence and understanding."

Dr. Norman's findings are similar to trends indicated by studies conducted recently at universities in Western Canada. "The basic purpose of this investigation is to encourage informed and lively debate within the academic community at Queen's," he says.

Professor Norman has suggested for consideration by the Faculty of Arts and Science a number of possible remedies for these problems. These include Queen's taking an active lead in bringing problems of literacy to the attention of the high schools, elementary schools and the Ministry of Education, screening applicants for admission, mounting a more ambitious program in remedial English, providing more help within the framework of existing university courses, and raising the minimum academic standards for the three year general degree.

Bus-its future unsure says AMS executive

Whether or not the Bus-it system will continue might well become an issue this year.

The AMS Executive implied in a policy statement submitted to the Outer Council last Thursday that the future of the Bus-it system might be jeopardized.

Not only does the AMS not expect the Kingston Public Utilities Commission (PUC) to spare Queen's from the raises in the local bus rate, which increased by five cents to a total of thirty cents last summer, but it has also been served notice by Principal Watts that the University no longer considers itself committed to its present 40 percent contribution to the cost of Bus-it.

In its statement the AMS emphasized the utility and value of the Bus-it service to Queen's. Not only has it provided some impetus to the growing trend among students of living further away from campus, but more importantly, the service is seen as a virtually indispensable link between main and west campuses. In terms of the last consideration, Jamie Avis, AMS President, contended that the University's present contribution to Bus-it was less costly than the maintenance of a shuttle service between the two campuses.

The executive takes the stand of previous AMS executives. Avis and company recognize the need for Bus-it but refuse to accept the idea of supporting it at any price. The present agreement has the university paying $3.55 per student. This leaves the students with $5.35 each to pay if P.U.C. passes on the increase, the per student cost could rise to $11.00. In this situation the A.M.S. is faced with two possible responses on the part of the University. On the one hand the University could refuse to increase its support, leaving the A.M.S. to pick up a $6.45 charge per student. On the other hand, the University could withdraw entirely, leaving the students to foot the entire bill of $11.00 per student.

Having already expressed its opposition to higher student interest fees, the AMS executive would then be faced with the decision of when to drop out of Bus-it. While Avis refuses to put a dollar value on the service, he acknowledges that many students never use the system and there is a certain injustice in asking such students to subsidize those who do use it. Avis has claimed that the present 40 percent contribution on the part of the University is inadequate and that any less would be "intolerable". The system, therefore, would be when the University refuses to accept what he calls, "its responsibility", for assisting in the system.

Therefore one can expect the Bus-it system to come to an end, should the University refuse to accept what Avis maintains is its "responsibility" in assisting the system.

Kill the Bus-it scheme

The idea of losing the Bus-it programme should not be particularly upsetting to the bulk of Queen's students, the majority of whom live on or within minutes of this relatively self-contained campus. They rarely use the system enough to justify their $5.85 annual contribution to the scheme. The lion's share of the rides upon which the total Bus-it price to Queen's is calculated are taken by commuters between West Campus and the main campus.

Without Bus-it, the payment of individual fares by West Campus commuters would represent a substantial increase in the annual cost of attending Queen's. At the proposed new bus fare, 30 cents per ride, twice a day, five days a week, for 26 academic weeks per year, a commuter student from McArthur would pay a grand total of $78.00 per academic year for transportation.

When the satellite campus was developed, the administration was wisely allowing for expected future expansion between the two centres of population. This westward expansion will take place over the course of many decades. Its progress, though, has hardly been noticeable since West Campus was created.

West Campus is an isolated island of Queen's and many now consider the project somewhat premature if not an outright fiasco.

The AMS has, with some justification, insisted that the university subsidize to a greater extent the present cost of the Bus-it system. At the moment the students pay 60 percent of the cost, with the balance being paid for by Queen's. Now, with the increase in fares, the Bus-it scheme stands to fold under unless the administration absorbs the additional cost. The bulk of the students not only are forced to subsidize the system for the minority but also pay a premium price for accommodation in the student ghetto.

The university should absorb the increase for the students. This, though, is an unlikely premise at best given the present financial problems at Queen's and considering the Principal's negative preliminary response. Alternatively, the students could once again increase their contribution to the system. This, though, would add to the already outrageous sum already paid by the great number of students who have little use for Bus-it. The most sensible suggestion would involve the AMS and Queen's in a jointly administered bus shuttle service from West Campus to main campus from Monday to Friday. As at present, this would give West Campus students the opportunity of commuting to main campus virtually free of charge and would allow those who ride the Kingston buses for non-academic purposes to pay according to usage.

Bus-it was a fine idea before the PUC decided to renegotiate price at every opportunity. Economical alternatives exist, let's let Bus-it die its natural death.

AMS reps impotent

The Outer Council of the AMS has never been entirely trusted to make important decisions. The criterion for putting a question to the student body on a referendum is almost too easily fulfilled. Either Outer Council's sanction or a petition with 5 percent of the student body, roughly 500 names, need to be gathered for any question to be added to a referendum. Political questions of extremely major and general concern will go to referendum for reconsideration if an individual disagrees with Council's decision and is excited enough to gather 500 names during dinner time in residence. The AMS executive's new policy, though, of automatically placing major political question on the semi-annual referendum makes Outer Council formally impotent.

The principal of representative student government is defined on page one of the constitution of the Alma Mater Society. In its rep-governing capacity, the AMS performs three basic functions. They are: to provide services not already furnished by the university administration; to "serve as a medium of communication between students and the governing bodies of the University"; and to encourage an awareness in the student of their responsibilities in the national and international university community.

To date, the Avis administration can be commended for their dedication in attempting to adhere to such terms of reference. Nevertheless, such efforts are seriously undermined by the automatic referral to campus referenda of major political issues. Such referenda serve only to make redundant the responsibilities of Outer Council. They constitute a severe depreciation of the concept of representative government and imply a grave lack of faith in the judgement of elected student representatives.

Policy decisions should not be removed from the realm of representative government. With rare exceptions only decisions regarding increases in the student levy should be made by the students. Otherwise Outer Council need not exist; what's the point?

AMS Exec. changes referendum policy

Tim Greenwood

As one of its policies, the new AMS executive proposes to make some important changes in the twice yearly on-campus referenda. These changes concern the makeup of the referenda, which questions will be put on the ballot, and the AMS's responsibility to take a stand on these questions.

The new executive felt that the almost exclusive use of last year's November and February referenda to determine adjustments in the student interest fee was to the students' detriment. Putting annual increase proposals to students on two separate occasions discouraged them from adopting priorities or making tradeoffs. AMS president Jamie Avis pointed out, and he felt that last year's 'very large increase' in the student fee could be in part attributed to this practice. The executive proposed putting all questions concerning fee adjustments exclusively on the February referenda while the November referenda will be used to canvass student opinion on broader student issues. Questions on the issues of 'accessibility to post-secondary education' and 'quality of educational institutions' are expected to be included. It is also proposed that the election for the position of Rector, left vacant by Bruce Trotter's resignation, be included in the November referenda, in order to avoid having two campus-wide ballots in one month.

The new policy also concerns which questions will be put on the ballots. (In the past, there was the suspicion that the inclusion of questions implied AMS sanction). This year the policy suggests that any question submitted which is 'well-expressed and which represents a serious effort to solicit student opinion on a matter of general concern' should be approved regardless of Council's own position on the question. The responsibility of the Council will then be to adopt a policy on each issue, inform the students of their position, and encourage them to support the AMS position. The executive feels this will allow the Council to express opposition to a referenda, without denying anyone the opportunity of putting a reasonable question to the student body.

"No revolution in South Africa" claims critic of John Vorster

by Annette Nicholson

In a lecture here Sunday evening Mr. Harry Schwartz presented Queen's students with a first hand account of recent developments in South Africa. Mr. Schwartz is the deputy leader of the Progressive Reform Party, one of the parties in opposition to John Vorster's government.

"There is no revolution in South Africa," Mr. Schwartz claimed. Riots are taking place yet in Mr. Schwartz's view, white control is not seriously threatened. He emphasized that there has been no attempt to overthrow the government, rather, black people have wanted to be heard, to show that in a time of important events they should have a voice.

Despite the recent riots, Mr. Schwartz is optimistic that a peaceful solution can be found. "There is a hatred but...there is enough goodwill to be able to work together." He stressed that both black and white see the whites as Africans not settlers and that at least 40 percent of whites are against apartheid.

Although Mr. Schwartz noted a recent trend towards relaxation of segregation, pointing out some positive actions of the government, he feels the changes are "wholly inadequate."

"I do not seek to argue that in fact discrimination has been abolished and I do not seek to argue that the trend is moving quickly enough."

Mr. Schwartz attacked the independence policy for the homelands, the logical conclusion to the policy of apartheid. Thousands may become stateless, losing South African citizenship, and not necessarily being accepted by the homelands. Over 50 percent of the possible citizens of all eight homelands live in "white" South Africa. Blacks must choose between becoming independent in the small fragmented homelands and remaining South Africans citizens with no political rights.

He rebuked people who in their ignorance distort the facts and exaggerate the situation, because by

A memorial service will be held in Morgan Memorial Chapel (old Arts building) at 12:30 p.m., Tuesday, October 5. Padre Laverty, Principal Watts and the President of the Alma Mater Society will officiate and members of the Petrie family will be in attendance.

AMS withholds support of CLC protest strike

by Reynolds

The Outer Council of the Alma Mater Society decided last Thursday night to support a motion denying support to the CLC day of protest, scheduled for October 14. In taking such action the AMS ran contrary to the National Union of Student's (NUS) position to lend full support for the National Day of Protest.

In opposing the motion which called for non-support of the CLC's protest, Bill Burgess pointed out the injustices done to workers under the wage and price controls. Ross Sutherland, also opposed to the motion, pointed out how closely aligned the liberal government was with the interests of big business.

To oppose what he saw as the combined forces of the industrialists and the Liberal Party, Sutherland noted how the only effective means of protest lay beyond conventional methods - referring to the illegal general strike. Sutherland went on to suggest that what was legal was not necessarily just.

In speaking for the motion, AMS President Jamie Avis stated, "I don't think we have an extreme enough situation to justify such a radical form of protest." Avis noted that although at times the interests of students can be identified with those of labour this is not one of those times. In summation Avis reminded members that most of the students at Queen's did not support the actions of the CLC and that members would not be representing student interests if they defeated the motion.

doing so they undermine his cause, which is to remove apartheid. He implied that most sympathetic people here are misinformed and have no clear idea of the issues involved.

NDP Column

by John Campey

(condensed from NDP Provincial releases)

Last fall there was a "Honeymoon" period in the newly-elected minority legislature of Ontario which yielded, among other things, a rent review bill that was potentially strong, progressive, and fair. The NDP played a large part in creating that bill, and hoped that it would be administered in the spirit in which it had been enacted.

It is now over ten months since the bill was passed last December, and the administrative structure, from appeal board down to the local rent offices, is now in place. For the first few months, the NDP held back criticism because some of the start-up problems were almost inevitable. But now we feel the time for charity has passed. Whether through incompetence or design, the rent review process, it is becoming increasingly clear, is tragically biased against tenants. It is also increasingly clear that the minister responsible, Sydney Handelman, and his senior staff neither understand what is going wrong, nor are they willing to correct it.

To start with, many landlords are charging rents raised far above the 8 percent increase without appealing their case first. This action is illegal, but landlords can intimidate their tenants into silence. However, if the tenant does decide to do something about it, his troubles only begin. Tenants are shunted from one local office to another, their heads spinning. Tenants are given conflicting information - one booklet tells them they must be present at hearings, while the local office says their attendance is not necessary. The tenant is not notified of his right for appeal or for access to information from the landlord, while the landlord is often helped, personally, by rent review staff to complete his forms. They are also advised on how the process works.

Then there are the hearings. Rent review officers are required to have a background in property management - which probably means that they are not overly sympathetic to the tenants to begin with. Twenty of the seventy-three officers have backgrounds in government, while another twenty were in real estate. A tenant is allowed only one representative, while landlords are appearing with three or four professional advisors.

There is usually no explanation of how the hearings work, and generally they are held behind closed doors. If a tenant mentions maintenance, he may be ruled out of order. While tenants are required to produce documenting evidence, landlords are seemingly taken at their word. In Ottawa, for example, the owner of Island Park Towers claimed to have seven caretakers, but the tenant said there were only two. The landlord then changed his mind, saying there were five caretakers. The rent review officer made no comment.

Clearly there are problems, and severe ones, in the administration of rent review. Mr. Handelman has said that he detests rent review, but then he called the short term program of rent review a "success". It may be in his terms, but clearly he isn't out to protect tenants.

Liberal Column

by Sheilagh Dunn

This column is designed to present the views of the student Liberal club on campus regarding political events of the past week. An effort will be made to analyze events in terms of the reasoning behind such occurrences, and to examine the probable consequences. Such action may be necessary to distill the actual content of events and relay their importance to the student public. Recitation of facts does not contribute to a politically aware public. Therefore, we will continue to comment on relevant topics in an effort to achieve this goal. From time to time, we will present brief outlines of government policies which may be little known but have an interesting effect on the private and public sectors.

Prime Minister Trudeau's swing through the Maritimes this past week had a two-fold purpose. He was actively defending his government's wage and price controls policy while meeting with party workers and supporters to encourage party morale.

Unfortunately, reaction to Trudeau in the Maritimes seems to reflect partisan lines. In areas where the Conservatives are strong, crowds jeered the PM and refused to listen to his defense of the present wage and price controls. However, in Liberal ridings, the Prime Minister was accorded warm welcomes, with displays of Trudeauism not seen since the election of 1968.

With the wage and price controls now in effect for a year, the government's main policy must be explained to the people on a personal level, especially those unhappy about having wage settlements rolled back by the Anti-Inflation Board.

Many people may feel that the government was dishonest in apparently appropriating Stanfield's program of controls as stated in the '74 election. However, the Liberals had a contingency plan of wage and price controls ready during that election to be used only if no other program could control Canada's inflation. This policy has helped to hold down inflation during the past year.

The latest Gallup poll figures have shaken the Liberal party and indicate a need for a party reorganization to recoup any losses in voter affiliation. The Maritimes is one of the Liberals' weakest points and one of high unemployment and disenchantment with wage and price controls. The Liberals cannot risk losing the whole Maritimes vote to the opposition. However, it appears that Eastern voters are sticking to previous party identifications and the Liberals may not have made any inroads in obtaining new votes.

Trudeau is also sending out his cabinet ministers into the country to help encourage party workers. These speeches indicate a new trend in Liberal tactics - frank, hard-hitting, ready to admit mistakes but quick to defend policies the Liberal government feels are essential. Hugh Faulkner spoke for bilingualism in Calgary. John Munro, Minister of Labour and Robert Andras, President of the Treasury Board, spoke in favour of wage and price controls in Vancouver and Kitchener respectively. These ministers and others can be valuable in helping to reaffirm the Liberal government's standing. We hope this new outlook is amenable to change in policy where necessary and Canada can look forward to a tough, far-seeing government emerging from the shaken Liberals.

The Queen's student Liberal club has existed for a number of years and meets to discuss policy and the effect on students and youth in general. This year, the club hopes to meet every two weeks. Members have the opportunity to attend both federal and provincial conventions. This is an exciting way to see behind the scenes of political action and gain new insight. New members are welcome. If interested, please contact Liberal club president Gord Howe at 549-5807.

PC Column

by Rob Welch

At the Ontario Progressive Conservative Party's Youth Convention a couple of weeks ago, Premier Bill Davis talked of a "Post-Restraint Period" in Ontario Government spending policy. He said, however, that cost-efficiency will have to be practised in all provincial programs. At the same meeting Provincial Secretary for Social Development Margaret Birch, among other things, encouraged individuals to rely on themselves, not governments, to better themselves and their communities. She was proud, she said, to call herself a "conservative". The young Tories gave her a resounding ovation.

The Tories are likely to continue to develop these ideas in the months preceding the next provincial election. They seem to feel that "Government", whether it is Federal, Provincial, or Municipal, is being perceived, in this time period, as something else that the individual has to fight. This anti-"Government" bias, the Tories argue, manifest itself in a belief that governments involve themselves in too many things, regulate too many activities, and spend money on too many programs that individuals and community volunteer groups could look after.

One could wonder, though, why Mr. Davis talks of a "Post-Restraint period" and, in the same breath, declares a war on waste in government spending. It might appear as if the Premier and his fellow P.C.'s have taken a page from Jimmy Carter's book on how to flip-flop on issues. The present observer does not quite make that

While accepting the arguments that Government's role has to be limited, and that wasteful government expenditures have to be cut, the Tories seem to have realized that the somewhat heavy-handed restraining methods of the past year, when cabinet ministers came from Queen's Park to close a hospital or tell a municipality that it would only get an eight percent increase in funds, were not well received in all parts of Ontario. So Mr. Davis mentions a "post-Restraint period". Restraint will continue for a while. After it ends, the public will have to accept some new government programs, and increased spending on some existing ones. But, the Tories seem to imply, increases will be limited and funding will be controlled.

These ideas, combine the essential political qualities of both leading, and following, public opinion. The P.C.'s are agreeing with a public which, on the right hand, wants to limit the government's role and government spending and, on the left hand, criticizes the provincial government's restraining methods of the past year. Yet the Tories are also encouraging the public to see that government activity will have to continue. These views are significant. Of greater immediate importance to Ontario Tories, however, is that the successful articulation of these thoughts could very well be one of the factors upon which the re-election of a Provincial Progressive Conservative Government depends.

When does law become unjust?

by Howard Smith

Is obedience of the law essential when its substance seems unjust? Does an "unjust" law warrant the breaking of other laws? These types of questions lay at the very heart of the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) proposals of a one-day protest strike. Whether or not Queen's should have joined other Canadian Universities in boycotting classes to sympathize with the CLC protest was an issue at the most recent AMS meeting. The CLC, a syndicate of unions in Canada, will break the law to protest the injustice of wage and price controls and the Anti-Inflation Board. The illegality arises because unions are by legislation prohibited from striking while they have a valid collective agreement (union contract with an employer). Although the CLC is cognizant of the unlawfulness of what they do, they believe the injustice of rolling back a labourer's hard-won salary increments vindicates their illegal action. In effect they are saying, "the law is not just, therefore it warrants illegal remedies." This is the rhetoric of civil disobedience.

One only need address one's mind to the Nazi Jewish Extermination Laws, the Viet Nam War Statutes or the contemporary South African Apartheid legislation to recognize that there are cases where, although the law seems unjust, it is legal. Are such laws, however, automatically their worthy target of civil disobedience? It's easy to conclude that wage and price controls, like genocide, the Vietnam War and apartheid are unjust and thus are deserving of lawbreaking. However, the danger of this conclusion is, how do you know wage and price controls are an injustice?

There were, and still are, people who believe in the justice of racial extermination, the Vietnam War and apartheid. If this is so, there is not uniformity in the minds of men as to what constitutes justice; thus to say justice overrides the law and will be obeyed when the two conflict is to invite anarchy. For example, assume half of us decide that the laws regarding stop signs and red lights are not "just" and should be disobeyed. Knowing this, no one could depend upon another car stopping at a stop sign or red light, for fear that its driver might be one of those who intends to disobey. Thus because the criterion of "justice" as the law itself lacks uniformity, it lacks reliability.

The CLC believes wage and price controls are not just; the Government of Canada and the Liberal Party believes they are just. Who is right? Thus to our initial question "Is obedience to the law essential when its substance seems unjust?" one must answer with the question, "Unjust to whom?" Hence lacking substantial uniformity as to what is "just", the criterion of justice is a dubious one upon which to promise change.

AMS meeting argued that, because wage and price controls were so abysmally ineffective, the CLC should be supported. Were the CLC's proposed action purely legal, this might be a valid line of argument. Having regard to the illegality of the proposed action, however, to glibly so conclude is to gloss over this unlawful element and its implications.

Our system is replete with legal remedies: we have such things as legal protest and demonstration, we have the media, we have access to opposition parties and local members of parliament, we have parliamentary votes of non-confidence, and we have our cherished vote at the polls. There is little doubt in my mind that the wage and price controls are as criticized, ineffectual and unmanageable. Nevertheless, I submit that the price of anarchy's "thin edge" should be considerably more than a few bucks each payday, when in a matter of months we can have the same with Canada unharmed. If a fly-swatter will do, surely you must have a good reason for using artillery?

Which direction will China take?

And what of the future of China, a nation housing nearly a quarter of the world's population? At this point in time everyone seems anxious to speculate on the destiny of a country which is potentially heading into an uncertain and possibly dangerous future. And why not? The future of China is everyone's concern at least in terms of global power strategies.

The presence of Chou-En-Lai and Mao Tse-tung was a restraining and moderating factor in international affairs, making for a tenuous yet reassuring atmosphere in which to conduct new policies of world trade and diplomatic shuttles. However following the fall of Teng-Hsiang-ping earlier this year, uncertainty once again beset Chinese leadership.

In China today the prospect of disorder, bordering on Civil War, is very real. The man in charge for the time being is Hua-Kuo-feng, premier and First Deputy Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party. However his prospects for continuing as helmsman are very much in doubt. Essentially a moderate, Hua's political base has yet to be established and no doubt we may assuringly expect challenges from the radicals and the military. The radicals, led by Mao's wife, Chang Ching and Wang Hung-wen are basically isolationist, whose goal is to strengthen the revolution at home. On the other hand the military, headed by Chen Hsi-hen tend to shun close contact with the radicals and favour heavy industrialization so as to secure a place for China in the power echelons of the world. Although closely attuned to moderate views, Red Guard fanatics during the Cultural Revolution alienated many young moderates and animosities are still running high. Thus Mao's call for a "perpetual revolution" may yet be fulfilled.

However only time will tell. If nothing else, China must prove itself to the outside world. Prove not only the potential for an orderly succession of power, but rather prove that after a quarter of a century she has developed and now possesses a sophisticated bureaucratic machinery capable of maintaining future administrations in power. We shall see!

Week stopped abruptly

Dear Editor:

Does anybody know what happened to all the spirit that was flowing around during Orientation Week?

From the hand of a Frosh, that week was great. There was no problem in talking to people, laughing and generally making a blissful fool of oneself. I thought that University was going to be fantastic - through the course of a single week I could feel myself loosening up and opening out.

I have a friend at home who left Queen's for Western University after her first year because, "Queen's is just too conservative and conventional." Believe me, two weeks ago she couldn't have been more wrong. But all of a sudden it's not the same.

Orientation slammed to a grand finale Sunday night, September 19. The transformation undergone by the entire campus that night (on the stroke of midnight, I am sure) was remarkable.

The change wasn't due solely to the sobering actuality of the beginning of classes, but to a heavy influx of third and fourth year students, and second year non-Gaels.

This group of end-of-Orientation-Week invaders is an unsmiling menacing bunch, too intellectual to notice a passerby on the sidewalk.

What happened to the convivial atmosphere we Frosh were deceived into thinking was typical of Queen's? What happened to the "ideal, cloistered community?" It's just like being in the outside world, on campus - no one smiles at you, everyone is too busy to spare a moment. I haven't heard an Oil Thigh for over a week!

Look out, Queen's. You may have an excellent reputation academically, but your social assessment is falling alarmingly low. "All work and no play makes Jack a very dull boy." And Plumbers. And Artscis. And Commies. Sandy Stephenson

by Richard Trites

I walked into a house on Garrett Street, obviously late. The President and his debating partner, Mr. Carter, were fielding their first questions from Wall Street Journal's eminent Frank Cannon. To some quizzical looks, I hauled out a raunchy bit of paper to keep score.

Ford and Carter were each well aware that unsatisfactory performance in the debates might have disastrous effects in the election of November 11. Their attitude was rightly serious as a New York Times column the following day quoted network audience estimates at 50 million.

Bob Reynolds drew first real blood questioning Ford on his administration's confusing stance on tax reform: increased personal exemptions and reduced depreciation allowances coupled with a balanced budget in fiscal year 1978. Ford answered poorly, and Carter went to the attack, indicting Ford's administration for economic mismanagement that he said had only irritated inflation, stagnation and negative growth, unemployment and the poor balance of payments position.

Carter was then asked to reconcile his intention to implement tax breaks with his objective of a balanced budget in 1981. Reeling off projections of GNP growth, and assuming the deletion of an unspecified number of "unnecessary" government programs, Carter confidently predicted a new economic order, and "Washington morality" when he moved into the White House.

Ford later criticized Carter's reference to a substantial dividend for the taxpayer in the reduction of executive-sponsored programmes recalling the so-called "Vietnam Dividend" of Mr. Nixon's administration. The dividend, to come from a reduction in the defence budget at the end of the Vietnam War, was totally absorbed in the following year's defence budget as personnel pay increases and tremendous increases in costs of development of weapons systems.

Carter, addressing himself to economic woes recalled his success as Governor of Georgia, in efforts to consolidate and reduce executive departments and agencies. He felt the same techniques in Washington would reduce executive duplication. Then with the first flash of the knife, Ford refuted Carter's figures, asking that the record show that the present governor, Mr. Bushy felt that the Medicaid programme he inherited was in a shambles.

Reynolds questioned Ford next, noting that the Amnesty plan, of September, 1974 had only repatriated 10 out of an estimated 100 thousand deserters and evaders. Ford answered well, projecting moral conviction, yet showing a compassion that probably didn't cost him any votes. The question, rephrased by Cannon, provided Carter with a springboard for a general critique of the American judicial system. Carter's "morality" slant was clearly evident in the concentration on the 'human misery' part of unemployment, and a 'revisionist' critique of American monopoly capitalism.

The Carter economic critique lacked constructive alternatives to the present tax system, and reduced Carter's criticism to nothing more than vote-getting opportunism. Quotes about wealth distribution attempted to link the economic inequity with Executive morality and efficiency.

I retired from the scene when the audio portion was forever lost and the Women's Voters League was wondering how they could restore Carter's comment answering Ford on the subject of policing U.S. intelligence agencies.

Comments on Garrett Street varied from pronounced cynicism to a vague feeling that Ford did rather better than he was expected to. Over an issue like moral leadership any vague feeling will help Ford. In the two weeks or so preceding the first debate it had been supposed that the more flamboyant Carter riding high on his smile would decimate the plodding Ford in verbal confrontation. Despite Mrs. Carter's assurances to the contrary, Jimmy looked surprisingly nervous and put-off in several instances. Apparently ex-comedian J. Penney, who had coached Ford on his delivery, did a good job. More importantly, Ford "outplussed" Carter in this year's mad rush for a "nice President." Robert Duvall, was also excellent at providing the President with reply substance on the bleak economic condition. Carter publicly preferred the help of no PR specialists, valuing "straight talk" with the American people. It is doubtful, however, whether Carter declined normal preparation of his technical background on a wide area of domestic issues (sessions with academic giants, briefing sessions by research personnel, and likely questions and answers - no doubt cross-referenced so as to be useful as either answer or as a shuttle to the other candidate.)

What has the debate and more generally, the campaign, shown to be the main issues? Aside from the obvious issues of tax relief, reduction of unemployment and the creation of an efficient economy - the more important issue is leadership. Specifically, moral leadership as an issue demonstrates how distrustful Americans are of the outputs of their political system. The believed moral degeneracy of the Presidency has been cited as the main worry of the U.S. citizen, trust in government declining dramatically to 33 percent in 1976.

Most observers would contend that there is a crisis in American leadership, yet the concentration on this theme leaves both candidates open to the temptation "to score points from theatrics" in the debates.

In "substance," Ford did very well in the debate, especially in light of Carter's ammunition (poor economic performance.)

The next debate will centre on defence and foreign policy. Ford must defend his approval of defence budget estimates of a horrendous 104.3 billion dollars. Carter on the other hand, would cut budget by 6 to 7 billion, something Ford says would destroy the country. Carter would sack Henry K. With issues like detente, approval of weapons systems and African diplomacy on the agenda the next round should be as good or better than the first.

Research on Disraeli's Letters:

Instant Intimacies and Tales of Arson

by Hugh Dodd

Research is continuing on an ambitious project carried out by a Queen's University team to collect and publish the letters of Benjamin Disraeli, British Prime Minister during the latter half of the nineteenth century.

The Disraeli Project, headed by Dr. John P. Matthews, Senior Editor, has been in operation since 1972. At that time, Dr. Matthews and Dr. D.M. Schurman (History Department) were contemplating a sabbatical year research undertaking. Some 2,800 letters written by Disraeli were known to exist, and it was felt that with a little diligent digging, perhaps a few hundred more would be discovered.

However, by 1973, nearly 10,000 letters had been located, and up to date, 6,000 more have been found. As Dr. Matthews states in "Disraeli Newsletter", "The gentle sabbatical research task had become almost overwhelming. Increasingly obsessive, a life's work."

Dr. J.A.W. Gunn, of Political Studies, became the third principal investigator. In addition, the research team acquired Dr. Nils Clauson, formerly of Dalhousie University, as executive assistant of the Project. Dr. Clauson recently completed his Ph.D. thesis at Dalhousie on the novels of Disraeli. Ms. Lynn Haver, formerly of the School of Graduate Studies and Research, also joined the Project as executive secretary.

According to "Disraeli Newsletter", the research team intends "to publish, in chronological order, all the letters of Disraeli which we are able to locate. As partial justification it should be said that Disraeli wrote very few dull bread-and-butter letters. If he cannot accept an invitation, he usually says why, what he is doing instead, and what he would rather be doing. Even the more mundane short notes may have an importance in terms of date, place and recipient, of which the editors are not aware, and as a consequence, they are not prepared to exclude any as 'unimportant'."

Beginning in 1978, the letters are to appear in chronological order in The Collected Letters of Benjamin Disraeli. At a rate of two volumes a year, the 32 volumes presently contemplated will take 16 years to produce. Fortunately, the gargantuan undertaking has received substantial, long-term support from the Canada Council, giving it national footing. The pre-1838 letters should appear at the end of the summer of 1978.

The Disraeli Project is staffed by Queen's graduate students and post-doctoral fellows, and has the support and interest of a host of Disraeli scholars and enthusiasts in Canada and Britain.

To encourage the British connection, the principal investigators travel to the island once a year. The vast majority of the Disraeli letters have surfaced in Britain. However, both Canada and the United States have made a contribution too.

The Project has acquired a great many letters that have never been published. In addition, letters that have already been published in biographies are to be included. Ms. Haver, of the research team, points out that early biographies of Disraeli often inaccurately edited his letters

An innovative feature of the Disraeli Project is the use of a computer to assist in some of the routine mechanical operations. A great deal of time is saved in the preparation of edited text, for the computer eliminates the need for frequent retyping.

"Disraeli's letters to women...had a quality of almost instant intimacy. By the second or third letter, he managed to convey the impression of close friendship of long-standing. We have found a number of instances, alas substantiated, where these letters had been carefully preserved in a bundle by their recipient (sic), and discovered by relatives who, scandalized by the intimacy of their tone, destroyed them to preserve the family's good name. In all cases where this happened, Disraeli and his correspondent had never met."

In tracing the descendants of Disraeli's known correspondents, the editors have encountered, as one might expect, a wide range of family legends which account for the destruction of papers which they hoped might have survived. These range from explosion, terrorism, arson, accident and assorted forms of both mayhem and inadvertence. The most common, however, was as follows: either an ignorant maid-servant or an inebriated footman (invariably one or the other) is reported to have destroyed archives containing Disraeli letters, always by fire and all between 1901 and 1911. This happened so often, that the editors suspect the growth of a racial myth—perhaps designed instinctively as an unanswerable defence against the obduracy of North American research enquiries. Either that, or a tendency of considerable, if as yet unreported, significance involved the domestic servants in Edwardian country houses in a wave of uncontrollable arson.

"Credence is given to this theory by the location of three collections which, it had been alleged, had met this fate. The Drunken Footman cases, therefore, are in a special category, and we have not given up on them, as we were tempted to do at the beginning."

An author of considerable skill, Disraeli wrote 12 novels. His literary flair spilled over to his letter-writing, for his letters are "fascinating, witty, and very readable", according to Ms. Haver. Disraeli shows us a picture of his world, full of marvelous detail about his time. "It is an interesting point of view from a supreme politician and a brilliant writer", Ms. Haver states.

Industry quiet re:
role in S. Africa

(Adapted from an article by Linda Blancet and Katy Le Rougetel, reprinted from The Gateway)

Edmonton (CUP) — This summer the Republic of South Africa was shaken by what may have been the most widespread uprising in the history of the South African liberation movement.

The riots in Cape Town and Johannesburg were sparked by several issues like language, and a new Vorster effort to further stratify and segregate South African society.

Frustrated by the Vorster regime's apparent indifference, students and workers from the black township of Soweto rioted this summer, setting off a chain of demonstrations which underscored the frailty of the white supremacist regime.

The recent uprisings are merely an indicator of explosive social tensions that have been building in South Africa for centuries. Black Africans are crowded onto "reserves" or Bantustans, which are kept in utter poverty. They may not own property or settle in white areas of the country. They must carry passes at all times or be thrown into jail. They may not form or join trade unions, and strikes by Black workers are banned. Black workers' wages, at present averaging one-twentieth those for whites, remain at a starvation level.

The cornerstone of South Africa's apartheid labor policy is the migrant labor system, under which Blacks contract for labor in the cities for one year at a time, usually in isolation from their families. This system ensures a large degree of government control over the movement and employment of Black workers, and provides employers with a regular and inexpensive supply of labor.

Most of Western Europe and North America maintain economic and political links with the Vorster regime. South Africa offers attractive incentive to foreign investment, including large deposits of gold, diamonds and other valuable minerals.

The Canadian government, though it has condemned apartheid in South Africa, has not discouraged Canadian corporations from taking advantage of trade and investment opportunities there. Such big-name industrial concerns as Massey-Ferguson, Alcan and Falconbridge maintain subsidiaries in South Africa.

Despite the view that foreign investment may be a liberating force for Black South Africans, the record of Canadian corporate involvement shows the opposite to be the case. Black workers have won a number of concessions as a result of large upsurges and foreign pressure, but their status remains abysmally low.

Information about the activities of these Canadian subsidiaries in South Africa was derived from a study by Hugh Nangle appearing in the Ottawa Citizen in June 1973.

According to Nangle's study, the total assets of Massey-Ferguson's South African subsidiary increased in ten years from more than $20,890,000 in 1962 to more than $28,530,000 in 1972. But at Massey-Ferguson's plant in Vereeniging, the overwhelming majority of Black workers were paid less than the government's official poverty line (PDL Poverty Datum Line). The lowest paid white worker at the Vereeniging plant earned at least $191 monthly above the PDL.

This disparity in wages is maintained by laws that deny Black workers the right to form trade unions and protect their wages and working conditions. These are determined by government labor councils controlled by whites.

Dr. L.E. Knoll, chief executive of Massey-Ferguson in South Africa claims his Canadian shareholders would be "very unhappy" if Black workers were paid higher wages. Since the company obviously has the resource to substantially reduce or close the wage gap between Blacks and whites, it is evident that Massey-Ferguson intends to continue operating completely within the framework of the apartheid system.

According to Nangle's study, the total assets of Alcan Aluminum's South African subsidiary are more than $41,300,000. However, at Alcan's Pietermaritzburg operation, the Black workers are paid extremely low wages in comparison to the white workers.

In addition, they are expected to purchase their own overalls and safety boots. There is no assistance to workers in obtaining adequate housing and educating their children.

The company has no regular bus service for its Black workers to their homes in the African townships, even though the municipal buses are overcrowded before they reach the Alcan plant.

Alcan maintains an expensive in-training program for non-white workers but it is felt that these are maintained in the interest of improved product and profit, not in the interests of the Black workers.

Falconbridge of Africa Ltd., a subsidiary of Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd., operates mines in Namibia and Rhodesia.

The Blanket Mine in Southern Rhodesia made a profit of $13 million in 1972. Yet the starting wage for Blacks at the Blanket Mine was 56 cents a day in 1973.

Some Blacks who had worked for Falconbridge for more than 20 years received about $45 per month. In contrast, some white workers involved in supervisory and maintenance work received $810 a month.

Entire Black families are crowded into two-person shanties made of corrugated asbestos sheeting. Recreation facilities consist of beerhalls and pot-holed soccer fields. The majority of whites, on the other hand live in spacious, attractive houses and have access to a swimming pool, tennis court and clubhouse.

"It is not unfair," writes Nangle, "to charge that Falconbridge is operating a slave labor mine."

Falconbridge also operates a large copper mine in Namibia or

Move over, Mrs. Markham

An appetite for naughty tinglies

by Donald Rayko

Move Over Mrs. Markham is a British bedroom farce currently playing at the Domino Theatre under the direction of Ronald Macpherson. To get technical for a moment, "farce" denotes that species of drama which aims at raising laughter by the outrageous absurdity of the situations or characters exhibited; and "bedroom" denotes that sub-species which feeds on the possible risibilities of cuckoldry and other such matters pertaining to birds in the hand, the bush, the bed, the bathroom: wherever it titillates the prurient interests of the prudish, indulging an appetite for naughty tinglies while still staying within the secure framework of home, hearth and the missionary position.

Farce must flow. It has to be as precisely timed and tightly choreographed as an assembly line for Cadillacs or a chorus line of Rockettes. The absurd must happen naturally, for the humour is in exactly that irony. It is a genre with its own set of conventions; it can be done well on its own terms, or poorly.

Over at the Domino, they're giving it a good go. The script is by Ray Cooney and John Chapman and it's peppered with sight-gags, double entendres and more silly convolutions of plot than you can wiggle a soft noodle at. It's the old story of mistaken identities, botched assignments and infidelities more honoured in the intent than in the consummation.

Mr. and Mrs. Markham are the faithful couple whose friends, the Lodges, unbeknown to each other, plan separate extracurricular trysts for the same time and place — the Markhams' (supposedly) vacant flat. Meanwhile, Alistair Spenlow, the Markhams' swishy interior decorator, and Sylvie, the au pair, have similar naughtinesses in mind for that same space and time. But events take their usual improbable vermicelli twists and turns, and just when the most unlikely people (naturally) are struggling at snuggling, in walks maiden-auntish Olive Harriet Smythe, authoress of the Bow-Wow doggie books from which publishers Markham and Lodge stand to make a fortune—if they're moral enough. Get the drift?

The obvious stiffness of performances in the first act had generally mellowed by the second, and those opening night jitters should soon be gone. Stephanie Sveinbjarnardottir and Ray Dignum played the parts of Mr. and Mrs. Markham. Although Mr. Dignum at times appeared a bit too constricted in his movements, his characterization conveyed the proper griggishness needed for Markham, and Ms. Sveinbjarnardottir evinced admirable poise and confidence with her role, her first in English. Stella Baxter's Mrs. Lodge was a suitably frustrated wife, though Bob Conway failed to convince as the satyr Mr. Lodge. Donovan Baxter and Jayne Coulter as the Rockettes The absurd must happen naturally, for the humour is in exactly that irony. It is a genre with its own set of conventions; it can be done well on its own terms, or poorly.

Marion Flower's vivacious Better Homes and Gardens set was just the thing you might expect from chic, chic Spenlow: a fine job. The same goes for Ruth McKay's costumes. Taking the production as a whole, a lot depends on how you feel about duplicity. If you aren't the sort to get ethical indigestion from a play that attempts to justify itself by affirming the traditional mores in the last five minutes after methodically tantalizing one's conscience for the previous two hours, there's a good chance you'll enjoy it.

There's slack to be taken in, certainly, but on her own terms Mrs. Markham can look forward to a fun run.

All's Well is flawed but fun

Staff: This summer, the Drama Department at Queen's sponsored a special three-credit program designed to investigate the problems encountered in the production of period plays. The well-known British director Michael MacOwen, was invited to Kingston to work with this group of students. He has said that he eschews "concept" when dealing with plays. To him, this means "making it all up in the director's head beforehand and then treating the actors like puppets. That simply doesn't work."

"All's Well" deals with love, (in fact, Shakespeare had originally entitled it "Love's Labours Won't" - sound familiar?) Love's initial triumph is thwarted and then reborn in a more complete, more beautiful bloom. No gimmicks necessary - none used.

MacOwen is a member of a dying breed of directors who work closely with and directly from the text. The problems of adapting the Shakespearean milieu for the modern audience are especially acute for this type of director. How he copes with them is often as interesting as how he handles his actors.

MacOwen has chosen to dispense with Lavatch the Clown, as he found him "boring and not at all funny" to the modern audience. This may be so, but certain adjustments have to be made in the remaining text to compensate for those functions which this character DOES perform. The Queen's production does not fully make these changes, and a certain amount of confusion ensues.

A good example of this is the scene between Helena and the Countess in which the latter lends her support to the former's plans for capturing the wayward heart of young Bertram. The transition of the Countess from angry accuser to co-conspirator was too sudden and had little textual precedent.

However, Friday night's audience enjoyed the production immensely, and with good cause. Superior performances were put in by Maureen Salter, Ted Bairstow, Howard Hughes, Jill Chamberlain and Barb Edwards (once she had warmed up to the task). In fact, the work of most of the cast members was among their all-time best.

This is not to say that the production was perfect. Perhaps a slight rustiness on the part of some of the actors was responsible for some slip-ups. In particular, Len Whalen as Bertram did not seem up to the challenge of fleshing-out the behind-the-scenes character.

Though MacOwen did not use it to its potential, Russ Waller's unit set presented a very open stage area that facilitated almost unlimited movement on many levels.

Debra Hanson's Regency costumes were a visual delight. Their bright colours pinpointed the actors on an otherwise grey set. The only sour note here was the lack of consistency in time period. Pilgrims appear in Franciscan robes, kings in Regency wear, soldiers in Fort Henry red. Perhaps this was intended to lend a timelessness to the production. It's effect, however, was to bring the audience back to the present asking "What period are we in now?" Still, the pros far outweighed the cons in this valuable theatre experience.

Both performers and audience benefited from a chance to see and to be a part of something which may never happen again.

Greg Ford discusses the the Hollywood cartoon

The Hollywood Cartoon Film Series is being held this fall in Ellis Hall on Wednesday evenings.

To give a general overview on the Hollywood Cartoon as a socio-political art form Greg Ford, the designer of the series will speak on this Thursday, 30 September at 8pm in Ellis Hall on University Avenue. Admission is free to this lecture-film programme.

Greg Ford has become the North American expert of the Hollywood Cartoon. He has written numerous articles for film magazines as well as producing cartoon festivals for the past six years.

The men who made Hollywood cartoons never intended them specifically for children. During the '30's and '40's everyone went to the movies, and short subjects of various kinds - cartoons, live-action comedy, newsreels - were a regular part of the program. The Hollywood cartoon directors in particular were able to exercise a large measure of control over their own productions, writing or collaborating on story lines, creating new characters or altering old ones, drawing key poses, and occasionally even writing the songs. By the '40's, Walt Disney, the most successful and best known of the cartoonists had his factory, and his product was no longer an individual statement, as he moved from the role of artist to that of producer. Meanwhile, Warner Brothers was gifted with producer Leon Schlesinger, who allowed his artists to do anything they wanted, as long as their cartoons made money, and with the team of anything-goes Tex Avery and the literate Chuck Jones. While Disney's product grew progressively more pretentious and uptight, the more he concentrated on the lucrative family-entertainment market, the Warner's cartoons became more and more sophisticated and daring.

Many of these cartoons though are never shown nowadays. Some of them, such as the racier Averys and the more frankly propagandistic Clampetts, which were acceptable to audiences of CIs during World War II, have been censored. Others can be caught on kids' shows on Saturday morning TV, thrown in with made-for-TV cartoons of the Hanna-Barbera variety, which really are made for children. And maybe some of the others aren't shown simply because they're too violent and disturbing. Rick Thompson, in his brilliant analysis of the Roadrunner series, points out, "Yessir, these cartoons were made by grownups without much condescension to kids whatsoever; like the best subversive and surreal art, they were recognized as dangerous by defenders of propriety... Much more than B pictures, the antic art of cartoons provided an outlet for the truly off-beat, anti-establishment ideas and images." (December magazine).

Since the Vaghy brothers were born in Hungary they have a great affinity for Hungarian music. The highlight of the September 29th concert will be Bela Bartok's third string quartet. Other works include The Hayden quartet opus 77, number 1 and the Brahms C minor quartet.

Tickets for the concert are available from the Performing Arts Box Office, John Orr Room in the University Centre at $1.50 for students, $2.50 for general admission.

Jeff Beck: Wired

by Sandy Graham

Once upon a time there was a little English rock band known as the Yardbirds. This pitiable collection of coal miners' sons played their hearts out in the pubs and watering-holes of London's suburbs hoping that, golly, maybe one day they could get a recording contract. Fortunately for our heroes, the wave known as the "English invasion" was just beginning to wash over America's shores. The Yardbirds did get that contract and the rest is history. The group became one of the most outstanding Rhythm & Blues outfits of the sixties, characterized by numerous extended guitar improvisations. This is not surprising in view of the talent which passed through the Yardbirds' ranks: Eric Clapton, Jimmy Page and Jeff Beck.

Of these three once considered rock's premier guitarists, only Jeff Beck has retained any of the style which made him famous. His new album, "Wired", reveals an inventive energetic guitarist who has never played as well. While his competitors have faltered of late (Page has submerged himself in Led Zeppelin and Clapton fancies himself a vocalist), Beck just keeps on getting better. He has never let his creative mind wander far from his guitar. Even the Jeff Beck Group which he formed after leaving the Yardbirds was little more than a vehicle for his playing (Rod Stewart might argue that point).

"Wired", by all standards, is an excellent album. Its most outstanding feature is variety. Beck shows us the many sides of his personality, something he has been reluctant to do in the past. This may be because he did not write any of the selections, perhaps preferring to dazzle his critics with his versatility rather than his songwriting. Which is not to say that the music is not Beck's in style. The speed, unpredictable phrasing and driving syncopation clearly label each cut with "Jeff Beck". While he may lack Clapton's lyrical competence for instance, there is no denying his brilliance as a technician.

One cut, "Goodbye Pork Pie Hat" written by Charlie Mingus, shows Beck in the light of true blues. The tones are deep and guttural at first, with a marked twang of contempt. The song then rises to a marvellous contest between pure ringing notes and raunchy distortion. The song following it, "Head For Backstage Pass", is a spirited number and presents Beck's quick, snappy playing. The album's classic tune is "Led Boots" which again highlights his electrifying rapid-fire technique, but to a much more satisfying degree.

Beck isn't too absorbed in himself this time out, a habit for which he has been attacked in the past. He gives a great deal of responsibility to his backup musicians for the record's overall sound. Keyboard-man Jan Hammer and bassist Wilbur Bascomb respond particularly well, the latter with a solid opening solo to "Backstage Pass".

The excitement, originality and energy in this album are surprising in today's world of formula music. Truly Beck's finest.

Christenson goes it solo

by Davis Eagle

Saturday night last, Bitter Grounds opened its weekly coffeehouse with a folk performer in the person of Terry Christenson. Until just recently Terry has been a rock musician with a group called Buckeye and is a comparative newcomer to the folk scene though his familiarity with the folk idiom is evident in his classic format of introducing each song with a relevant introductory story. Most of Christenson's material was focussed around his early experiences in the north near his home in Parry Sound and more particularly his association with the Indian community there. One such song which he played in the third set proved to be a departure from his usual Travis-picking style and concentrated on an abstract backing of his original version of an Indian tale of the demise of the wolf.

The guest set was done by an upper year commerce student Bob Pakul who seems to go to Douglas library only to write songs. Bob adequately accompanied himself on guitar and alternated his own material with that of Lightfoot, Croce and Bradstreet, which is a reasonable way to do things except that he sounded much better doing his own material and might have been wiser to stick to it.

Terry Christenson played harmonica and both six and twelve string guitar in a solid but not flashy style, using his lyrics to sell his songs to the rather small but appreciative audience. Terry suffered from a similarity of sound inasmuch as he rarely broke away from a 4-4 ballad format. As well, the P.A. was not sharp and tended to make his voice rather fuzzy. Technically he was very tight and overall he gave a professional performance which one might expect from a guy with two albums to his credit. High points of the evening included a traditional song called Dona Dona Dona, a strangely moving tune popular in the 1950's and an original piece titled 'Don't Wait Up Tonight.' The latter was what could be described as an 'ace lick,' one which anyone would be proud to have written, and is a ballad of the quality his other songs must aspire to pass from enjoyable to exceptional.

Next week Bitter Grounds will offer a night of traditional and contemporary blues as interpreted by Jackie Washington. If you're into the blues at all don't miss him.

An introduction to drama at Queen's

by Eric Hughes

Queen's university has always been a major contributor to the cultural life of Kingston. In the fields of music as well as the literary and visual arts, Queen's students and faculty members have maintained a high standard and a large following in the community. Not to be forgotten are the endeavours of the campus dramatists - instructors and students - who present lively and diversified forms of entertainment for the university and the city at large.

The fact that the university is in the town has greatly influenced the numbers and types of activities that occur outside the campus. This is due to student participation in the events, and student interest as an audience, as well as to the available expertise of the various faculty members who enjoy donating their time and energy to projects outside the academic milieu.

The artistic relationship between the university and the community, especially where drama is concerned, is symbiotic. Without the educated and selective audiences that the Kingston community provides, such productions as are put on by the various Queen's dramatic groups could never be mounted. And again, if these productions were not put on, the audiences would not learn selectivity - a cycle that can benefit all.

There are several drama groups using Queen's University as their base. I suppose that the largest and most prolific (as of now) is the Drama Department. Using a schedule inaugurated several years ago, three major productions will be performed, one in the first term and two in the second. The first will be Anton Chekov's "The Cherry Orchard", auditioning this week for performance in November under the direction of Dick Trousdell. More about that as the opening night approaches.

The second major production will be Moliere's "Tartuffe". The third is yet to be announced. Auditions for Drama Department productions are open to all members of the university community and people are always needed for backstage work as well as that which occurs in front of the curtain. Besides being a good way to meet people who are interested in drama, it is an excellent opportunity to work with seasoned professionals as directors and a chance to LEARN, LEARN, LEARN! I would strongly recommend that any drama major, medial or minor, participate in at least one major production during the year.

Sunday Workshops at the department will be revived this year, with student-directed productions on alternate Sunday evenings at eight. As for all department-associated productions, audition notices will be posted on the bulletin board at the bottom of the stairs in Theological Hall.

A second important group on campus is the Queen's Musical Theatre company. Their past performances of such plays as "Bye, Bye Birdie", "Gypsy", and last year's "Brigadoon", have been successful productions full of energy and imagination. Although this year's show has not yet been announced, it will be performed in February, around the time of (but not during) Reading Week.

For the first-year student. Maybe you were in musicals in High School - remember how much fun they were? Remember the triumphs of opening night? That's Q.M.T. - only we're on a much larger scale AND, you will meet friends to last you the rest of your life at Queen's, (maybe even longer) I know because I have.

After a short renaissance during the past couple of years, the Queen's Drama Guild seems to have gone back into a state of hibernation from which it will hopefully revive sometime this year. In the past the Guild has been responsible for some interesting experimental productions and a season of radio plays on CFRC and on CKFM last year. With a little organization, we may see a successful Drama Guild building its own niche in the drama community again this year.

With the exception of MacArthur College, which will be covered in a future issue, these are some of the activities which originate on campus and, for the most part, stay here. Both serious productions and entertainingly light ones are presented constantly throughout the year. There is no shortage of opportunities to express yourself as performer, backstage worker or audience. Take advantage of them!

Industry quiet re: role in South Africa

South West Africa, illegally administered by Vorster's regime.

Namibia is rich in minerals such as uranium, copper, and diamonds. South Africa rules Namibia by virtue of "an international instrument", the Mandate of the U.N.

Attempts by South Africa to annex Namibia formally have been thwarted; but despite U.N. declarations, the economic exploitation of Black workers and plundering of the country's resources by the foreign interests goes unhindered.

Canada actively encourages Falconbridge's mining operation by granting the corporation tax deductions. This directly contravenes a 1970 U.N. resolution declaring that all member states are obliged to "discourage" their companies from investing in Namibia.

Canada has repeatedly made statements condemning apartheid and the Vorster regime. In 1963, for instance, the U.N. placed an embargo on arms sales to South Africa. Canada supported the resolution. Yet military hardware manufactured by Alcan is used today against liberation struggles in Namibia.

The issue of Canadian involvement in South Africa extends to other South African countries, as well. In December 1960, Canada voted in favour of a U.N. resolution pledging unconditionally to bring an end to colonialism. But in 1973, Mitchell Sharp, the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, refused to discuss the Portuguese liberation wars in the NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization), council, writing that it would be "neither appropriate nor effective."

An important component of Canadian support for the responsive Vorster government, is Canada's membership in NATO.

Within its network the Canadian ruling class gives substantial military support to the South African regime.

The U.S. has a guided missile station and a space tracking station in South Africa. A naval surveillance system established with the help of NATO members at Silvermine allows South Africa to keep under surveillance an area from South America to Bangladesh. NATO forms and stock codes were used throughout this operation enabling South Africa to function as a de facto member of NATO.

Defense against the "threat" of Soviet ships in the Indian Ocean is a convenient pretext for NATO collaboration with Vorster's regime.

In reality, these military agreements represent an attack on South Africa's Black workers.

NATO members are fortifying their immense economic investments in South Africa against the country's explosive internal situation. In return for using South Africa's strategic bases, NATO provides the Vorster regime with arms to protect white rule and western investments.

The Canadian ruling class and its government remains silent in the face of western collaboration with apartheid. Through the common arms pool of NATO, Canadian military hardware frequently finds its way into the armories of South Africa.

As members of NATO, as arms manufacturer, as investor in South Africa, the Canadian ruling class is responsible for supporting the crimes of the South African regime.

The Queen's Golden Gaels clip Ravens

by Tom Shand

On a cold day up in Bytown the Carleton Ravens fell prey to a hungry Golden Gaels team who are only a few finishing touches away from being a force to be reckoned with in the O-QIFC. The score was only 15-10, however the Gaels outoffenced the Ravens by 415 to 264 yards, a dif-

first half which they won 10-3. The field goal was from 31 yards, as was Shore's for the Gaels, and came after a well constructed drive highlighted by the running of halfback Jim Dale. Dale with 121 yards rushing and took with 4 receptions for 86 yards supplied almost all the Raven's offence. Gaels played aggressively but much more within the rules than last week as they reduced their penalty total to 55 yards. However a double ten yard call set the situation for Carleton's field goal as Ravens sent in Nigro for the first and 30 play and Latham threw the ball in hands of the extra deep back who moved the ball into field goal position for the Ravens.

Bob Vanderwater drove for 103 yards on 19 carries to lead the Gaels attack. Jim Duncan added 77 yards to their total, thereby allowing the Gaels to maintain outstanding ball control.

With four interceptions and a fumble recovery as well as two turnovers on downs, Gaels "D" obviously enjoyed playing most of the game in the Carleton end of the field.

Defensively, Gaels looked sound however a stronger pass rush may be needed in future games. Offensively, Gaels moved the ball well however twice were shut out within arm's reach of the end zone. Blaine Shore has a strong leg but needs practice from in close. Doug Latham played well again, but still is not consistent in his setting up and delivery of the ball.

Jim D'Andrea: Defensive Star

ference which was more indicative of the margin in play. Jim D'Andrea was unquestionably in the finest hour of his football career. D'Andrea intercepted three Raven passes and was his usual brilliant self in defending the run. The veteran defensive back literally stole the Raven's blind on two occasions not only terminated Raven drives but also served to inspire the Latham-led Queen's offence.

Gaels were given two chances to score from D'Andrea's first theft. They missed on a field goal attempt but Ravens gave them another chance to score as they drew penalty which gave Queen's a first down. However, Gaels came out empty handed in three tries from the five. Later in the match Gaels did convert on the turnover as Blaine Shore increased his 2 game total to 30 with a 6 point pass from the ten.

Gaels first touchdown was also inspired by the excellence of the defence who stopped a third down and short yardage play on their own eleven. Gaels then moved 99 yards for a T.D. with end Paul Shugart and Doug Latham combining for the key play, an 85 yard pass and run play which fell one block short of a touchdown. Keith Taggart then made a key grab whereafter Latham dropped into the end zone to decrease the Carleton lead to one at 10 to 9.

Ted Tyczka also played a key role in defence as he took over from Tim Wardrop, who needs to adjust his style to compensate for his lack of height. Tyczka came in and provided solid defensive coverage and made a superb shoe-string interception. Wardrop was victimized on a 47 yard pass completed from Lee to Carleton speed merchant, Wood, which set up the games first major score by Raven fullback Green.

Ravens did all their scoring in the John Lynch saw action on two plays, gaining a first down when running from a "tightpunt" formation and overthrew Bob Vanderwater, who would have needed an extra foot or so to pull in Lynch's pass on a 2 point convert attempt

Soccer:

Wins Pair!

Gary Harvey

Queen's soccer team started the regular season off on the right track by snatching a pair of 2-1 victories from their visiting opponents this weekend. Going back to last year, the Gaels are now undefeated in their last twelve regular season games.

On Saturday, the Gaels defeated a tough McMaster team before a sellout crowd Mac started very quickly, as Queen's seemed somewhat disorganized. The Gaels settled down shortly however, and started pressing in the McMaster end of the field. The first goal for the Gaels was scored by Gord Taylor as he looted a soft shot over the head of the onrushing goalkeeper. Mac came back quickly and scored on a long free kick which the Queen's goalkeeper unfortunately misjudged and punched into his own net. Late in the second half a McMaster defender was found guilty of a hand ball in his own area, and Gord Taylor (just barely) scored on the penalty shot.

The score remained 2-1 for the Gaels as they dropped back into a defensive shell, content with their one goal lead. Mac put some pressure on the Gaels defense but never succeeded in unleashing any particularly dangerous shots towards the Queen's net. The Gaels attack was somewhat sporadic, and they failed to score on any of their numerous good scoring chances. It was with a sigh of relief that the Queen's side greeted the final whistle.

After a good night's rest, the Gaels took on Brock, who had been defeated 3-1 the day before by a weak RMC team. Needless to say the Gaels were somewhat overconfident and it showed in their first-half play Brock took a 1-0 lead on a Queen's defensive lapse as the goalkeeper had little chance to stop the shot. The Gaels forwards were frustrated on several good scoring chances.

A break came for the Gaels in the second half when they were awarded a penalty shot which Pete Hill put away nicely. The winner was scored by Jacques Shapiro on a beautiful pass from Gord Taylor on the left wing. The Gaels seemed to play just well enough to win, but as long as the winning continues, it will be difficult to complain. They thoroughly dominated Brock in the second half, and hopefully the goals will start coming a little more easily.

Queen's has a tough road trip coming up this weekend as they play Guelph on Saturday and Waterloo (second place last year) on Sunday. A pair of victories would indeed look very promising.

However, things look promising for a second victory against the Ravens here next Saturday. If our prayers for sunshine this Saturday are answered the rematch will be one you won't want to miss.

Notes

Left linebackers O'Connor and Panetta for Gaels and Ravens respectively were popping people with great regularity. Darrel Penner played well despite being hampered by hamstring injury and was missed on the kick return teams. Look for good things from Gaels' speedster Dave Best before season's end.

Tennis team nets win

In a meet that went down to the tiebreaker of the final doubles match, Queen's tennis team got past OUAA defending champion York University 5-4 to win the York Invitational Tournament last Saturday. The York-Queen's confrontation was set up when both teams blanked Trent, the other participant in the tri-meet, by a 9-0 count.

Against York, the key wins came from the Queen's number five and number six players, Tom Larsen and David Anderson. Larsen dumped David Midanik 10-7 to keep his singles record intact at 3-0 this year, while Anderson, a Halifax native in his first year at Queen's, hammered Davey Mitchell of York by a surprising 10-3. Ian Dolphin provided a third Queen's singles win at the number three spot, edging Peter McCarter 10-9. At number four, Mike Devine of York beat Pat Galey 10-5. Stewart Watt of Queen's bowed out 10-5 to former Canadian champion Pat Gamey at number one, and York tied the singles at 3-3 as Walter Crane beat long-time rival David Stauble of Queen's, 10-7.

Stauble and Watt came back to win the number one doubles match 10-7 over Gamey and McCarter, but Crane and Mitchell again evened the series by taking a tiebreaker match

10-9 over Dolphin and Galey. After trailing 2-5 in the tiebreaker of the deciding No. 3 doubles match, Larsen and Anderson picked up five straight points to win the tiebreaker 7-5, the match 10-9, and the tournament 5-4.

The tournament was the first event won by the Queen's team in at least ten years, and shows the great improvement of this year's team. However, Queen's will have to improve their play to repeat the win this weekend as Queen's hosts the OUAA Eastern Section. This meet will involve only the top four players from each team, giving York an apparent 4-2 edge based on last week's results. But changes are expected in the order of single-players and doubles alignments, plus Queen's will have the home court advantage. University of Toronto will also be involved this weekend, with a strong team attempting to regain their title lost last year to York.

Play will start at 9am Friday at the Queen's West Campus courts, or at Kingston Tennis World at the Kingston Airport in the event of inclement weather, and will continue through to Saturday morning. Spectators are encouraged to come out to give Queen's a little support.

Queen's waterpolo put under

On Saturday, September 25, the Queen's Waterpolo team travelled to Hamilton to play in McMaster's "early bird" tournament. Although the scoreboard would tend to indicate otherwise, the tourney was considered successful by Queen's coach Simon Beidler.

The squad this year is composed of a good balance between young players and older, more experienced veterans. The team combines both speed, strength, and size to a degree not seen before at this university. Newcomers (and freshmen) include: Graeme Black, Mitch Sent, Richard Glew, Jim Commerford, Chuck Leighton, Ron Watson, and Brian Watson, as well as law student Greg Vanular and MA student Jim Frost. Veterans on the team are goalie Mike Fox, Bob Brisbois, Dave Ardell, and Peter Trebliss.

Queen's first match-up was against the University of Windsor. Outscored 5-1 in a very confusing first quarter, Queen's fought back all the way, only to lose 9-7 at the final buzzer. Against McMaster, the story was much the same, with Queen's showing its best effort in the last quarter. The squad experienced considerable difficulty containing National Team and Olympic Games high-scorer for Canada, Peter Polfrier, who netted 8 goals in a 13-4 win for McMaster.

Coach Simon Beidler remarked after the games that he now knows exactly what the squad must work on. Considering that the team has only practised together three times, great improvement may be expected when Queen's meets York, RMC, and Toronto at Queen's on Saturday, October 2.

Queen's intercollegiate fencing

All interested in Intercollegiate Fencing at Queen's, please meet in the upper lobby of the Dance Studio of the Physical Education Centre on Thursday, September 30 at 5:30 p.m. sharp. Even if you've never fenced before but want to learn how, come to meet the Queen's Fencing Coach and find out what fencing is all about. There will be an "Introduction to Fencing" lecture and then an exercising session so please come appropriately dressed.

Rugby: A win and a tie

The Queens Rugby teams managed to produce a win and a tie in the weekend encounters with Waterloo, here at West Campus. The Queen's seconds under the leadership of Wilson Buchanan, continued their winning ways of the previous week, and defeated Waterloo's seconds 16-4. Balanced play between the forwards and backs typified the game and Queen's play. Rookie Alun Williams (an import from Wales) Counted for six of the Gael's points, and led the backs throughout the game. Bob Alge again did the kicking for Queens and tallied eight points in the game. The victory ran Queen's second winning streak to twenty-one games.

In the following game, the Queen's 1st XV appeared a bit flat-footed after a week of irregular practice. Before a crowd of several hundred, Queen's failed to take advantage of the strong, favorable wind in the first half, and found themselves trailing 6-4 at halftime. The strong kicking of Waterloo made it possible to capitalize on every penalty Queen's gave up in their own end.

Queen's came out for the second half, and immediately scored two unanswered tries (including the first of Fred DeVries career). When it appeared that Queen's was at last carrying the play, Waterloo broke down the Gaels defence, and took a 20-14 lead. The game was a minute from over when the Queen's captain Kevin Honsberger bowled over to give the Gaels a breath of hope. Trailing by two points, John Gibson saved Queen's from loss by kicking the conversion. The final score was Queen's 20 Waterloo 20. The next encounter will match Queen's and their Kingston rival R.M.C., Saturday October 2nd at Richardson Stadium, West Campus, at 2:00 p.m.

Cross-country runs over R.M.C.

What began on Saturday as a dual Cross-Country Track meet between the Queen's and RMC teams ended up more as an intra-squad affair. In fact, the first eight finishers in the 5½-mile race were all Golden Gaels! Although Queen's obliterated RMC, the race between the Gaels' 'S' team and 'M' team (so named because of the sadomasochistic tendencies of the sport), was very close indeed.

In the final analysis, the former, made up of Adam Shoemaker, Mike Deguida, Paul 'the Flying Frosh' Tinari, Dave Grant and Jan Rae just nosed out the latter, which included Bob McCormack, Roger Wheate, Dale Friesen, Duncan Rogerson, Brian Stagg, and Walt Sepic. Shoemaker won the race in a time of 29:01 and was followed by fast-improving Wheate in 29:53 and Freshman Tinari in 30:15. A Queen's graduate and former team captain, Bill Bryden also competed for old times' sake, and placed eighth in 30:57 minutes.

In all, the Queen's team left quite a dominating impression with their rivals across the bay. Next Saturday, the Cross-Country Gaels travel to Toronto for the York Invitational to defend last year's title.

Hearst

Patricia Hearst, the Symbionese Liberation Army kidnap victim, was sentenced Friday to seven years in prison for her part in the armed bank robbery of the Hibernia Bank. In addition, Judge William Orrick decreed an additional two year term to run concurrently. The second sentence was for Ms. Hearst's use of a firearm in the robbery. In convicting her Judge Orrick said to Ms. Hearst that "the violent nature of your crime cannot be condoned."

Ms. Hearst was given credit for the 371 days she has already spent in jail, making her eligible for parole in 11 months. However, her troubles are not over yet as she faces trial on January 10 in Los Angeles on charges of kidnapping, assault, and robbery.

Rhodesia

Prime Minister Ian Smith agreed Friday to surrender power to the Rhodesian black majority within two years. The announcement came after U.S. Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, had ended a ten day visit to Rhodesia to win black rule in that country. Rhodesia's decision was strongly influenced by the decision of John Vorster, Prime Minister of South Africa, not to support Rhodesia any longer. However Prime Minister Smith firmly tied the turnover to assurances he said he received from Mr. Kissinger that guerrilla action would stop, and the U.N. economic sanctions would be lifted.

The main points of the agreement were:

- majority rule within two years
- an immediate meeting between the government and black leaders to set up the interim government
- lifting of economic sanctions
- a 2 billion dollar external trust fund to boost internal development as "a major international effort"

The interim government is to be a two tier system with a senate-like council of state under a white chairman composed of half black members and half white. Also included is a council of ministers with a majority of black members and a black chairman. The main job of the interim government would be to draft a new constitution as well as be responsible for laws and general supervision of the government. In the main legislative body, the council of state, a two-thirds majority would be needed to pass a bill.

PM on Labor

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau ended a five day tour of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick by strongly criticizing labor critics of the wage and price controls programme. Noting his failure to win over labor by persuasion, Trudeau threatened to get tough with the movement, but hoped that their strong anti-government mood will soften after the Canadian Labor Congress has its day of protest on Oct. 14.

Clark speaks out

Progressive Conservative Leader, Joe Clark, accused Prime Minister Trudeau of causing unrest over bilingualism by "gratuitously insulting English Canadians who have reservations about the policy." The accusation came at a Prince Edward Island leadership convention in Charlottetown. The comment was a reply to Trudeau's statement that he was not surprised about opposition to bilingualism in P.E.I., because "there are bigots everywhere."

Clark said that bilingualism is overshadowing the country's other needs and Canadians will not be content until the Trudeau government gives priority to regional problems. Even though his party strongly supports bilingualism, he feels not enough attention has been paid to the problems the policy has created.

RC's vs Bill 22

Roman Catholic parents of Montreal school children have been renouncing their faith in order to escape paying a fee for sending their children to English speaking Protestant schools. Catholics are usually charged $900 a year for grade school pupils and $1900 for high school pupils in the Protestant school system.

Decline & Fall

One exhibition worth seeing is Decline and Fall at Agnes Etherington Art Center. The display aims to increase our awareness of the fate of our architectural heritage. Buildings of the classical and gothic revival styles are featured. Pictures, drawings, slides and artifacts show clearly the process of deterioration and decay of many historical buildings.

The pleasure of restoration is also given a place in this exhibition, and examples of "improvements" gone wrong complete the display. Admission is free, the gallery is right on campus, open hours are Monday to Friday, 9am to 5pm, Tuesday and Thursday 7pm to 9pm, Saturday and Sunday 1pm to 5pm, so why not give it a visit.

Chess

Kingston has been the location of some very exciting chess playing lately. Friday evening Jonathan Berry, a Canadian chess master, took on seven opponents simultaneously. As if this wasn't enough, he played blindfolded, seated with his back to the other seven chess tables. Berry never moved the chess pieces himself; an assistant went from table to table calling out the moves in chess language and placing Berry's pieces.

All Berry's opponents had helpful friends along, so really Mr. Berry was playing against a lot more than seven players. Brian Wrobel, news director at CKWS, was the first defeated, after about two hours of playing. Then Mr. Doyle, president of St. Lawrence College, accepted a draw. Douglas Jeffries of Station CKLC, Daniel Soberman, dean of Queen's Law school, Mark Smyka, a Whig-Standard reporter, Mayor George Speal and Brian Matthey, a staff member of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, were all defeated after three and a quarters hours of play.

Other chess events have taken place, and the tournament itself closed Saturday.

Oddments

Whenever someone flushed a toilet in one of the buildings of Ottawa Civic hospital the fire alarm went off. Someone had installed the new fire system too economically; he had used the same water supply pipe for both the fire system and the plumbing system.

Seatbelts really did help two women driving home to Portland from Smiths Falls. A car signalled them off the road. They stopped, and a man approached them. He tried to drag the driver from the car, but her seatbelt prevented it. She accelerated and dragged him some distance before he let go.

Americans pay forty billion dollars a year for paperwork. This sum is about the total of the Canadian federal government's annual budget.

Strange things come from Napanee. Stafford Way of 230 Simcoe Street got an albino carrot from his garden this week; perhaps his salad had some extra zip.

Howard Staff of St. Catharines handles his grapes with loving care. He harvests them automatically with two $42,000 harvesters. If frost threatens two helicopters fly over the vines during the coldest hours to stir up the air and prevent the frost. If the temperature descends below 27 degrees the Staffs light up 750 oil furnaces located in a fifty acre vineyard where some particularly delicate French hybrid vines grow.

He closed the Chevron

The University of Waterloo found itself without a newspaper after Saturday when the offices of the Chevron were ordered closed by Shane Roberts shown above at a conference at Queen's last fall.

Student newspaper meets its Waterloo

by Rob Reynolds and Giles Gherson
Last Saturday afternoon, the offices of the University of Waterloo newspaper, The Chevron, were closed down by order of The Waterloo Federation of Students. The action was precipitated by the abrupt resignation of the editor and the chairman of the Board of publications the day before.

In response to the resignation, federation president Shane Roberts ordered that the locks be changed at the Chevron office, thereby closing down the newspaper. In an interview with The Journal Roberts insisted that, "we closed it (Chevron office) for 24 hours," in the absence of a "reasonable person" to operate the student newspaper.

As a result of Robert's action, Chevron workers were instructed to remove their personal belongings. The federation president had made sure the campus police were present to escort workers through the office. The publication manager, Neil Docherty, however proceeded to write a story on the closure of the newspaper. Police tried to clear out the other workers who stayed to support Docherty. Faced with a confrontation between the newspaper staff and the police, Roberts chose to call off the police.

What ensued was a sit-in by Chevron staff members which lasted from Saturday until Sunday afternoon when the staff members announced their resolution. The resolution calls the action of the federation executive "an effort to muzzle student press." In their resolution the Chevron staff called on "the federation council to overturn the executive action and censure or apply other disciplinary measures to the executive". The declaration was the product of 35 Chevron staff workers and was dated the 26th of September.

The real reason for the takeover are unclear. Roberts claims that the editor was pressured into resigning by the Anti-Imperialist Association, he states, "had seven members working for the Chevron."

One of the alleged members is Henry Hess, news editor of the Chevron. Hess denies being a member of the AIA, as claimed by

Carbohydrate research institute established here

by Paul Finkel

An institute to pursue research in Carbohydrate Chemistry is to be established here at Queen's. The work of the Institute will be unique to Canadian Universities and possibly all of Canada.

Its purpose is "to pursue research in Carbohydrate chemistry" and "undertake research programs funded by external agencies and companies which by their nature are not suitable graduate research projects".

To be housed within the existing Department of Chemistry the Institute will be formal recognition for a group of professors at Queen's who have gained international status in research work of this nature. They are: Dr. J.K. Jones, Dr. W.A. Szarek, and Dr. G.W. Hayall of the Department of Chemistry.

Dr. R.L. McIntosh (Dean of School of Graduate Studies), spokesman when the motion for the proposed Institute came before the Senate, says the institute will hopefully provide summer work for graduate students, allowing them to obtain added experience in the field of chemistry. The projected budget for first year operations is $20,500.00. The funds, to be obtained through research grants from external sources, have yet to be officially negotiated.

The establishment of the Institute was not a unanimous decision by members of the Senate. Among those who raised objections was Dr. P.K. Christianson (History) who criticized the budget as being "pure speculation." He went on to say that Contract Research is not a top priority at Queen's and in fact does not belong in the University at all, because the Contract Agents (companies providing funds) define the nature of the research, not the people actually working at the Institute. Dr. Christianson also expressed a concern that other research groups would try to obtain the "high faluting" title of "Institute" in order to receive funds from external sources for studies that normally would not be paid for by grants from within the University.

The Institute is expected to be in operation by Christmas.

Ontario students pledge support: OFS on CLC bandwagon

Tim Greenwood

Following a statement by a representative from the Ontario Federation of Labour, member institutions of the Ontario Federation of Students voted to support the Labour's National Day of Protest, 13-5. Queen's, the University of Toronto, York and the University of Western Ontario were the major dissenters. Held last weekend at the University of Western Ontario, Queen's was represented by AMS President, Jamie Avis, Reese Cosgrove and Hugh Christie (External Affairs Commissioner).

Later in the conference, probably as a result of the outcome of the vote, Western presented a resolution proposing that each member institution be accorded votes according to its size. One suggestion was one vote for every 5,000 students. The proposal was not passed. Mr. Avis felt that if such a proposal were passed many of the smaller member universities would probably drop out of the OFS, thus weakening the organization's stature as the official voice of the students of Ontario.

The discussion on National Student's Day emphasized that it was up to the campuses themselves to make the day a success. Avis relished the fact that Queen's and Carleton appeared to be the best prepared for the day, and he emphasized that the day was to be one of awareness and enlightenment, not of protest.

The AMS's hope to keep a representative on the OFS executive was fulfilled when External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Christie was re-elected to the executive post he held during the summer. Mr. Christie is responsible for the eastern part of the province in the field of academics.

Some time was spent discussing the foreign student fee raises to be implemented next year. The OFS opposed the tuition increases on the grounds that it represents unfair discrimination against students from poorer countries.

The conference adjourned on a not entirely optimistic note, its host, Western about to present its students a referendum on the subject of whether to withdraw from the OFS or not.

Illiterate Queen's

"Illiterate". The word itself is sensational; it conjures in the mind a great many emotional images such as impoverished children playing in the grubby streets. Yet, the word has been applied to 71.2 percent of last year's first year class in Arts and Science. That 71.2 percent wrote either "badly or poorly" (34 percent), or "less than adequately but had the potential for improvement" (37 percent), according to Dr. Colin Norman's report entitled "The Queen's English".

A major criticism of the report, one which has come up in recent conversations among students, has been that the study was based on a sample of last year's final examinations. Dr. Norman justified the use of final examinations by saying that the exams provided "a common denominator which allows comparisons of various kind to be made". From the chapter of examples of exam writing it was easily discerned that some students were, in fact, unable to compose even a reasonably coherent sentence. Yet of these co-called "illiterate" students, how many were panicking from the pressure of their first set of university examinations, perhaps compounded by an inadequate amount of sleep or study or both?

Despite the grammatical sloppiness, to castigate students as "illiterate" under these circumstances is somewhat extreme. Had the study used essays, say, to assess levels of student literacy, the findings might well have been less controversial.

The impact of the findings of the report has been widespread. Major newspapers throughout the province have devoted considerable attention to Dr. Norman's findings. Editorials this week demanded improvements in the public school system. Some have hypothesized that the deplorable lack of literacy skills is derived from television's influence, inadequate standards in the high schools, multiple choice tests and even the disappearing bedtime story; in short, deficient exposure to the art of written communication. Of all of these, the first two might seem most at fault. It transpired from Dr. Norman's examples that the schools aren't producing many students capable of writing a sentence any more than what might be transcribed from a simple conversation.

The study also showed that by fourth year 75 percent of Queen's graduates are, in terms of writing ability, "impressive and probably as good or better than ever". It is at least reassuring to conclude that reading, practice in writing over time, and demanding standards produce "literacy".

Dr. Norman suggests a number of alternatives for consideration, the most popular among faculty and students being "greater liaison with the high schools of Ontario (i.e. informing them as to what standards we expect). Concrete identification and documentation of the problem has now been accomplished and standards to be met should be easily communicated. The problem now facing Queen's is twofold: encouraging the high schools to meet our standards and coping with the "illiteracy" situation at Queen's university writing ability improves among high school students.

Universities with high standards have a right to expect highly literate students. As is the practice at Oxford, perhaps a writing examination could be used as an admission criterion to university in Ontario. Of course, these exams would have to begin after a reasonable number of years to allow the public schools time to improve their curriculum to meet the new requirements. This suggestion would seem to be the most logical, yet it still does not ensure that standards in high school would improve.

In broaching the second problem, Dr. Norman relates the experience of York University as a sound possibility. There, a "writing centre" exists to which students are referred by professors. The students go over their English problems with staff using concrete examples of their problems such as a badly written essay. Workshops and tutorials follow and apparently this system has met with better success than remedial English courses.

Thanks to Dr. Norman's work we may now address ourselves to a problem which to now has been commonly noted but undefined.

G.W. looking better

The Golden Words has made a great number of improvements in its appearance and quality of content over the 10 years it has been on campus. On occasion the Journal and gw have disagreed in philosophy and some years the two papers seemed to disagree sheerly out of principle.

The gw staff so far this year has provided the campus with some very good articles and has toned down considerably the profuse obscenities evident in former volumes.

Last Wednesday, the Golden Words ran a mock front page of the Journal's first edition. Not only is this an encouraging indication of that staff's ability to read but also that they apparently have rather good taste in their choice of reading material.

Avis is rep to OFS

by Tim Greenwood

Last Thursday at a meeting of the Outer Council AMS President Jamie Avis was ratified as the Queen's chief delegate to the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). The justification for Mr. Avis' appointment to this position is twofold. Firstly given his position as AMS president, Mr. Avis considered himself uniquely qualified to represent Queen's students' interests to OFS. Secondly, this appointment can be seen as a fundamental aspect of the present executive's policy of commitment "to active involvement" in the OFS.

The executive proposes throwing its support behind the OFS on the grounds that the Federation has been maturing away from earlier days typified by "simplistic ideological rhetoric" towards becoming a representative body devoted to the "tough, pragmatic political work that is required for the protection of student's interests in Ontario." Mr. Avis admitted that the views of the AMS and OFS have often differed, but said that he believed that by working within the OFS, Queen's had the opportunity of convincing other student governments of the validity of its viewpoint.

The position of alternate delegate has been enhanced to include the duties of liaison officer between the students and the OFS. In this position Rees Cosgrove will brief students on matter pertinent to the OFS. This post is made necessary, as Mr. Avis has much of his time occupied with so many other duties.

Moreover the AMS will attempt to maintain increased direct output to OFS policy making by retaining a Queen's delegate on the OFS executive. This past summer AMS external affairs commissioner Hugh Christie served on the OFS executive.

Further evidence of AMS policy of involvement in OFS has been Vice-President Kathy Wood's contribution as a member of the editorial board of the Student, the official OFS newspaper.

The executive proposes to continue the practice of presenting selected OFS policy resolutions of a controversial nature to Outer Council for ratification.

Mr. Avis concluded his statement on the OFS noting that "this is the first time the AMS has made it a priority to develop its relationship to the other students of Ontario beyond the level of passing involvement. There can be few areas of more crucial long-term importance to students than this one."

This past weekend Mr. Avis, Mr. Cosgrove and Mr. Christie travelled down to the OFS conference in London as delegates from Queen's.

Another reason for hostility between the students' federation and the Chevron was an article planned by the paper to expose the student status of the executive. Hess pointed out that president Roberts had been at Waterloo for seven years, but had only been a student for two.

Roberts, however, was quick to reply that neither Hess nor AIA member Neil Docherty had never even attended the University of Waterloo. The federation president noted in response to a question and in unequivocal terms that "there was no pressure from the university administration". Roberts did add, however, "the administration probably isn't sorry to see it closed down".

At present Waterloo is without a newspaper as the student federation, Chevron's publisher, has frozen all funds.

AMS ups its loan fund

by Lyse Docet

At the AMS Outer Council Meeting, a motion was passed requesting that the Board of Directors of the AMS increase the balance of the AMS loan fund. The fund, whose purpose is to extend short-term loans to Queen's students, being presently insufficient to meet ever-increasing demands will be increased to $10,000 for current use and $10,000 for capital investment. Previously $6,000 was capitalized and $4,000 placed in the income account. The proposed increase will be by means of an allocation from the corporation's savings account which is to be held in trust by the AMS for the University. It calls for a grant of $8,263.11 to be made by the directors; $4,000 to raise the capital account and the remaining $5736.89 to be apportioned to the income account. In the words of Doris Laughton, the assistant registrar and administrator of the fund "Many students would suffer considerable hardship without the assistance afforded by our loan funds and I am truly convinced the need for this service will continue to increase."

Roberts. Hess states that the editor told the newspaper staff on Friday that he was resigning due to "personal reasons". When confronted with Hess' account, federation president Roberts replied simply "bullshit".

Hess conjectured that the inexperience of the editor, who had never worked on a newspaper before, probably led to his resignation.

Series Planned at Queen's Habitat and your community

by Anne Johnson

Inspired by the recommendations of the U.S.'s Habitat conference held this spring in Vancouver, Queen's school of urban and regional planning (SURP) organized a four-part seminar series, the first of which was held on Friday, September 24 in the Donald Gordon Centre.

Dr. M.A. Qadeer of SURP, one of four panelists for the evening as well as one of the participants in the original Habitat conference, explained that the seminars were organized mainly as exploratory forums in which local problems could be examined and possible lines of action proposed. In this way, Habitat serves as a type of framework within which representatives of local communities can meet to discuss problems related to economic development, social policies, urban planning and land preservation, as a follow-up to the original conference.

Included on the agenda for the evening was the showing of those films presented to the U.N. delegates outlining programs sponsored by the Canadian Department of Regional Expansion.

One part of the evening was devoted to a panel discussion. Along with Dr. Qadeer were Mrs. Lin Good of Douglas Library, Dr. John Page of York University and Mrs. Patricia Hodge of SURP - the initial organizer of the Queen's series. All four had been present in Vancouver for Habitat, and all gave their impressions of the outcome and value of the conference.

Dr. Qadeer felt that Habitat itself was stimulating, but was sceptical of the benefits that ordinary citizens were said to have gained from the event. He maintained that the delegates attending the conference were previously informed of the problems and solutions, and therefore Habitat's effectiveness in promoting specific action would be minimal. Dr. Qadeer is consequently more in favor of the type of local seminar now being sponsored by Queen's, for in this situation, specifics can be discussed. It might also trigger the organization of a citizens group which would bring its views before its local government and press for action.

Future seminars scheduled for November, February and May will each explore one of the basic themes of Habitat as each relates to planning and development in our own communities.

Campus Garage Sale

by Patti Ann Trainor

For students living off campus desperately requiring necessities from cooking utensils to bookshelves, last Saturday's garage sale put on by the Kingston branch of the Queen's Alumni Association, was the place to be.

"The primary purpose of the sale was to provide a service to Queen's students," explained Henry Fleming, president of the Kingston branch. "Students need these articles but at today's prices they can't afford to buy them brand new. By having the staff and alumni of Queen's donate furniture, utensils and other items, we were able to sell the goods at low prices."

The sale, in the basement of Grant Hall, began at 9am and continued until 3pm but after the first hour and a half nearly all of the 1,200 items had been sold. Approximately 200 students attended the event to buy or just browse.

The $800 made by the sale will be spent on students by helping to fund various university projects.

Anyone who did not make it to the "bargain basement" will have a second chance when the Kingston branch holds another garage sale next fall.

Queen's has more Canadian profs

According to the provincial government, Queen's ranks fourth highest among 15 Ontario universities in terms of the number of Canadian professors who constitute 77.9 percent of the faculty here. This percentage compares favourably to a high of 82.1 percent at Laurentian University and a low of 62.1 percent at York. Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, has commended Principal Watts on the exemplary hiring of Canadian faculty here at Queen's.

In memoriam

On Friday, August 27, Christopher Petrie (Arts and Science '77) of Ottawa was accidentally killed in a small Dutch town while riding his bicycle.

A memorial service will be held in Morgan Memorial Chapel (old Arts building) at 12:30 p.m., Tuesday, October 5. Padre Lavery, Principal Watts and the President of the Alma Mater Society will officiate and members of the Petrie family will be in attendance.

Bordelo:

Le Concert

By Chuck Mali

Pour M. Bordelo chanter, c'est voir de la beauté dans le monde et en semer; c'est mettre du bonheur en soi et en soi et en répondre autour de soi; c'est renforcer sa joie et la faire rayonner; c'est prendre la vie au sérieux et la voir avec optimisme; c'est découvrir l'âme profonde des choses et communier avec elle.

Après un si savoureux commencement, nous espérons que les étudiants prendront davantage de la série de concerts étant donnée en français et en anglais cette année à la galerie Victoria.

"Qu'est-ce que le folklore?" M. Bordelo nous a peint un tableau des mœurs des anciens habitants dans des chansons comme: "La claire fontaine", "Mon chapeau de paille", "On est Canayen ou on l'ai pas", "Nicola."

Que la chanson soit joyeuse ou d'une nature plus sérieuse, M. Bordelo nous communiquait toujours le "bon ton."

Dans l'interview qui a suivi, on a appris que M. Bordelo a connaissance "par cœur" de plus de 300 chansons canadiennes-françaises, qu'il improvise de temps en temps. M. Bordelo a donné plus de 52 concerts, cette année, la majorité dans des hôpitaux ou maisons de retraites ou les gens n'apprécient seulement pas sa musique mais sont capables de lui tourner avec des nouvelles idées ou chansons pour agrandir son répertoire.

When in Doubt, Mumble

Revue de Livres: When in Doubt Mumble; auteur: M. James H. Boren; publié chez Van Nostrand Reinhold Company, de New York.

Dans ce livre qui porte le sous-titre: "Le manuel du bureaucrate," on peut voir soit une savoureuse étude des dangers de la bureaucratie, soit une utile critique d'une administration déplorable.

M. Boren examine à fond la question de l'emploi intensif des siges, jusqu'au recours aux murmures ambigus. Il estime par exemple que le vrai bureaucrate ne doit jamais tuer, mais éliminer; il doit opter, mais ne jamais choisir.

L'auteur propose 26 attitudes propres à exprimer la réflexion: par exemple, le pouce bloqué sous la mâchoire, se gratter le double menton d'un air indécis avec l'index de la même main. Sa mise en garde contre les dangers de la communication sera d'un grand secours pour tout bureaucrate néophyte.

M. Boren énonce trois règles de conduite fondamentales: Face à des responsabilités, affichez un air de perplexité constructive; en cas de difficulté, déléguiez; dans le doute, marmonnez.

Pour se convaincre de leur efficacité, il suffit de regarder autour de soi.

Peter Dorn, Queen's graphic designer, has won three awards in the third annual Design Canada contest. They were for: the Faculty of Medicine booklet, and Agnes Etherington Art Centre exhibition catalogue; From Women's Eyes; and a book by John Barker, Strange Contrarieties, published by McGill-Queen's press.

The books were judged on design excellence, relevance of design to the manuscript, and quality of paper and production in relation to the cost per book....

TORONTO [CUP] -- Residence students in Ontario no longer have the right to appeal rent increases to the provincial rent review board.

From July, 1975 until May, 1976, all universities in Ontario were classified as landlords who were expected to justify every rent increase exceeding eight per cent.

Administrative problems forced a change to be made in the system. "The way it was set up, we would have had to file a separate form for every student," University of Toronto administrative director E.G. McDermid said. He said they would have needed two or three more staff just to handle the paperwork.

According to McDermid, one university had gone through 70,000 pieces of paper to plead its case. Universities across Ontario notified the government that the rent review, as it existed, simply could not be applied to university residences.

At this point, the government had two options, said David Warner, provincial New Democratic Party education critic. Universities could remain under the rent review by using a form of "class action", allowing the universities to file only one form for each residence or type of student. Warner said this would have simplified the procedure for the universities and students would still feel protected.

Instead, the government chose the second option. Sid Handleman, Ontario's minister of consumer and commercial relations, announced that university students did not require the protection which the rental act provided, and proposed that universities be exempted from the eight per cent ceiling.

The only right which students retain is that recognized student councils or association must be consulted before any residence budgets are passed....

TORONTO [CUP] -- Professors at the University of Toronto may follow the lead of their teaching assistants by forming a collective bargaining unit for salary and benefits negotiations this fall.

The U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) will decide soon whether they want the benefits won by the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) in their recent contract with the university.

A UTFA committee is preparing a collective bargaining document with "modest and reasonable" demands for an "iron-clad grievance procedure" and final choice arbitration based on the GAA gains for faculty to consider at their meeting October 6, according to committee head Jean Smith.

Currently 16 Canadian university faculty associations are unionized....

HALIFAX [CUP] -- Canada's provincial education ministers will make recommendations on student aid changes to the federal government soon, but these won't include a proposal to increase that aid.

At the close of the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada (CMEC) meeting here September 21-22, Manitoba education minister Ben Hanuschak said, "The federal government has not been approached to increase its funding of the student aid program," expected to be overhauled sometime soon.

Nova Scotia education minister Maynard MacAskill said the issue was discussed, but the ministers had nothing else to report about an expected new national student aid program.

The meeting was called to discuss the federal government's plans for increased involvement in post-secondary education policy, according to CMEC chair and PEI education minister Bennett Campbell.

The ministers told new secretary of state John Roberts that the provinces will set the terms for federal plans to increase second-language programs and would not give up their jurisdiction granted under the British North America Act.

The ministers had nothing to say on the effects expected from changes in federal/provincial cost sharing would have on post-secondary education, despite a report from informed sources that the Fiscal Arrangements Act (FAA) was to be on the agenda.

Under the FAA, due to expire in April 1977, the federal government matches dollar for dollar what the provinces spend on their respective post-secondary education systems.

Recent FAA negotiations, however, reveal the federal government will abolish this system and replace it with a transfer of tax points to the provinces.

The smaller and poorer provinces have said their small tax bases will mean decreased financing for education when the new system comes into effect next year....

Typing service dead

The A.M.S. typing service is destined to become a permanent referral service as A.M.S. Vice President Paul Steep revealed in his policy statement last Thursday.

Mr. Steep told the meeting of the Outer Council that concern over the typing service dipping into the red had proved to be unfounded, the service having ended the year with a net total of $13. A loss equal to the salary of the office typist had been predicted. Although one of the typists subsequently left the office, she was not replaced and the typing service thereafter became a referral service only. The saving realized on the typist's salary prevented the anticipated loss.

Mr. Steep studied the service during the summer and concluded that a typing service would never be able to fully cover the costs of an office typist. For that reason the new executive has adopted a policy which allows typing service to continue to be run as a referral service only. Mr. Steep believes this will not present any inconvenience either to staff or students.

Revenues up for Pub

Line-ups are seemingly the price that students pay to go to what Jim Russell, pub manager, refers to as "The best pub in Kingston." Indeed it is hard to believe that the capacity of the new pub, still unnamed, is larger than that of Wallace Hall and the House of Commons combined. The new pub seats 420 people, without dancing, and 340 with dancing. While last year's pubs held 361 people without dancing.

The added seating capacity combined with the overwhelming demand of students has increased the establishment's volume over last year. Revenues are up this year because as any denoted pub enthusiast can testify, is the increased prices on beer and liquor. The reason, according to Jim Russell, is primarily due to higher overhead, such as increased wholesale prices, having to pay more staff, and having to pay rent of $10,000 annually.

The Pub also had rather steep set-up costs including sound system, a computerized cash register and glasses. The Pub was not left entirely to its own devices, however, to produce the necessary money.

In spite of these setbacks, Russell still hopes to generate a small amount of profit. To help him manage "Kingston's best Pub," he has the new Pub had last year's Pub profits to draw upon for these set-up costs. According to Hines the capital expenditure to ready the new pub you can get in.)

Abortion and the law

Dear Editor

Re: When does law become unjust? The reasoning behind Howard Smith's article concerning the day of protest against Wage and Price Controls was that the "price of anarchy's thin edge should be considerably more than a few bucks each payday." There are, however, other unjust Canadian laws which involve far more than monetary issues.

Take, for example, the great Canadian dilemma concerning the abortion laws. A majority of citizens feel the issue of abortion should be between a woman and her doctor, yet the law makes it the decision of other people first. It is the hospital who first decides whether or not it will set up a committee to hear abortion referral cases. Secondly, it is the decision of a panel of doctors, who are, in their wisdom, to decide for the woman what the consequences of her bearing or aborting the fetus will be to her physical and mental health. Then the woman's view fits into the scheme of things.

"Our system is replete with legal remedies," says Mr. Smith. Yes, it is, and all of them have been tried - legal protests, demonstrations, use of the media, letters and petitions have all been used to no avail. Votes can be used, but only once every four years, and only if abortion is a plank in one of the three major parties' platforms. All legal methods have

So illegal methods have been undertaken, most noticeably by Dr. Henry Morgentaler, the Montreal physician who, although having been acquitted three times on charges of committing an illegal abortion (and each acquittal was based on the defence of necessity), has served time in jail, and possibly faces further charges. The dubious legal precedents involved in the handling of his case have been the target of protests by lawyers both for and against what Dr. Morgentaler stands for.

Yet if the government were to drop all remaining charges against Dr. Morgentaler tomorrow, the Canadian public would have the disheartening knowledge that it was not due so much to the exercising of the legal remedies our system is so "replete" with, as to the fact that the government has spent half a million taxpayer's dollars to date and has been unable to convict Dr. Morgentaler by a jury of his peers.

Concerning resistance to unjust laws, Mr. Smith has stated "if a flyswatter will do, surely you must have a good reason for using artillery." My question is this - what recourse is left if you dislike the use of artillery, but the flyswatter has failed?

Extension student speaks

by Joanne Brand

Many of you, I'm sure, have very little to do with the Extension Student. He is the student who struggles away at 3-hour night courses once a week while holding a full-time job. He is the one who persevered through the manic existence of intercession and summer school crash courses you say? Hacking in the true spirit of university life? Perhaps. But we do pay our fees and we do work very hard.

When an extension student applies to Queen's as a full-time student it is paradoxically easy but difficult. Everyone, including deans, registrar and extension administration says that there is no problem. The extension student knows differently. Firstly, he is not on anyone's list. No one believes he exists when he goes to collect registration materials. He has not received calendars, supplements to calendars or any up-to-date memos such as when to register or when one should have pre-registered, for that matter. An extension student receives no real welcome to the university, no orientation activities. He must tag along with the transfer students during Frosh Week in order to learn the "ins" and "outs" of the university. He must write letters, demand action and be thoroughly stubborn if he wants to belong.

The reason, apparently, for the lack of interest in the extension student who wants to work full-time at Queen's, is that extension students in good standing may automatically, without application, join the full-time students of the Arts and Sciences faculty. This however does not entitle them to sound information and advice that most other new students to the university receive.

It is my recommendation that the extension student who wishes to become part of the full-time machinery at Queen's be given the opportunity to make a formal application to the registrar or faculty of Arts and Science. Perhaps then he would receive the necessary up-to-date information and welcome that would make joining Queen's a more enjoyable and less frustrating experience.

Letters Policy

The Journal welcomes letters from readers. Due to space restriction, letters should be limited to 200 words. Libelous and slanderous statements will be deleted without consulting the author. Names will be withheld on request. [Author must furnish real name with contribution.]

Orientation:

Notes for future

by Mike MacMillan

Arts and Science Orientation is one of the largest organized events on campus. Involving over 2,000 students and faculty, it sets the tone for a student's entrance to Queen's. The effects of the week carry over into the next four years on a student's life.

ASUS orientation must be distinguished from the Engineering and Commerce orientations - Arts and Science students neither wear funny looking uniforms, nor climb greaspoles and are spared organized initiations or hazings. This doesn't mean ASUS orientation is perfect - far from it - it's just substantially different from other orientation programs.

Despite the number one priority of academics and course counselling, the week is still for some, a seven day binge of yelling, oil thighs and drinking. If these are the main things a first year student derives from orientation, then the week is a waste and a dismal failure.

Students will invariably settle in and make new friends. Socially, the week only speeds up the inevitable, at the same time often destroying some who wanted more than mingles games.

Orientation, should encourage in the student a self-examination of what one expects from Queen's. Cut-and-dried answers to these questions are not expected, nor indeed, are they desirable. The very grappling with the question "Why am I here" is a vital start. Choice of curriculum comes best after personal consideration has been given to the very purpose of the whole university process.

Hand in hand with asking "Why am I here" should go a never-ending questioning and inquiry of most everything. Ranging from the natural curiosity that Jamie Corbett talked about during Frosh Week to more organized analysis of the structure and values of society is a constant questioning process, one that universities are among the best at providing.

If that process is to happen at all it must start during orientation - left any later than that, social and classroom activities too soon take the fore. Doug Hennend's speech at Welcoming and "The Academic Cloister", screened at various times during the week, gave first year students two chances to consider the

"why's" of university life.

This intelligent thought orientation should be breeding (although not to the exclusion of everything else) isn't going to arise out of the wild chanting of Oil Thighs on Princess St. We don't want sheep here - we want individuals. This year, ASUS tried to de-emphasize the sheeplike chanting and tried to find something more pertinent and relevant - the question of "Why go to university in the first place?"

An "Oil Thigh" is not at all inherently destructive - it has simply in the past been used to foster a blind love for Queen's. How can a student know that "Queen's is Number One" after being here only four hours? That's not orientation, that's indoctrination.

The week remains much the same as always but I hope this year's committee left it with a couple of directional changes: alcohol less important, a quieter week, less screaming - and most importantly, at least some time spent questioning universities, programs, and the relationship of learning institutions to society. I hope too, that substantial time was spent analyzing oneself as well as society. First-year students should spend substantial time questioning what goes on around them - this is, after all, one of the most important purposes of a university. Unfortunately, this inquiry is most difficult to develop while students are being urged to blindly express a new-found "love" for Queen's.

Orientation must continue to change, keep going. It'll be tough. Next year's committee must grapple with the problem that we never solved, most upper year students who apply to be Gaels love the screaming, yelling and parties that presently so dominate orientation week.

It is especially hard to change when operating beside the orientation programs put forth by Engineering and Commerce, which still encourage hazing, initiations, early rises etc. - all degrading activities which are inherently antagonistic to the basic concepts of a university. This is not to say that ASUS has clean hands, still having "dead horses" and the like which do occur in the week. Future committees will face hard work to do what we could not.

It's a huge challenge that I believe we're beginning to tackle. Orientation is worth changing, if there are people here willing to invest their time to help.

Myths and social justice: how our reality is obscured

by Bill Burgess, Ross Sutherland

Yes my daughter, myths account for many of the threads woven into the ideological fabric of this society.

Nowhere is this more obvious as in the transparency of the debate directed at the National Day of Protest on October 14. Joining the rest of the right wing, the AMS (and the Queen's Journal) have exposed themselves indecently in their selection of political fine cloth to be worn on October 14.

The loudly touted rationalization, of adherence to legalities, is one of the most disturbing incidents in Outer Council's most recent display of parliamentary cretinism. The sense of "letting subservience to the impunity of 'THE LAW' that became apparent in that meeting approached the attitude to authority exhibited in the Milligram experiments.

What is important here is that such attitudes arise out of political analysis that is done effectively in a social vacuum - where myths obscure reality.

Let's take a look at some of those myths.

The question has been asked: "Wouldn't the people who defend the general strike react differently if it was business that locked out labour?" Well, obviously! This week attempt to find a fatal inconsistency presumes some sort of equality. 82 percent of the Canadian working population (i.e. the non-managerial, administrative, professional people) would be locked out in such a move! Democratic logic at its simplest would perceive a distinct difference between 18 percent of the population "blackmailing" the other 82 percent, and the other way around. Especially when the 82 percent are the productive workers

And then the point about the fairness and justice of this country is raised. In 1946, the richest 10 percent of the population received 20 times the income of the poorest 10 percent - by 1971 this increased to 45 times the poorest 10 percent. The mean income for full year, full time workers in 1971 was $6,523 (males $7,288, females $4,471). Last year, 63 percent of Queen's students fit into the top 14 percent of Canadian families who make over $15,000 per year, and 38 percent are in the top 2 percent at over $25,000. 1974 corporate profits reached their quarter-century high in their share of national income, rising 11 percent from 1971-74 (while wages and salaries rose an "inflationary" 48 percent). Over the last 25 years the richest quarter of the people got half of all new income and the poorest half got only 20 percent. So much for fairness and justice, or even moving towards some equality!

But won't holding back the wages of the highest paid allow the lowest paid to catch up? At least we'll have some equality among the workers! This is so much horseshit. It is mainly through the threatening strength of the unions that many social welfare programs, including minimum wage laws have been achieved. It is a sad fact of our society that you get as much as you have power in the market. Waitresses have no power.

Despite all the myths, there are grievous ills. The question is not whether a fly swatter or artillery can solve these problems, as Howard Smith might suggest. Rather it is, "Can general strikes do it before artillery does?" Take a stand for social justice. Join in on Oct. 14th!

High school illiteracy - Just another symptom of a grander malaise?

Dear Editor:

It was very disturbing to wake up Monday morning and find that the reputation of my school embarrassed on the front page of Canada's National Newspaper. We have come to expect such stories from the high schools, but surely it can't happen here! Well yes, it does indeed seem to happen here. Let's face it, when such a comprehensive report finds that only two percent of our first-year students are properly literate, there is something drastically wrong. It is not enough to blame it on the sloppiness (or non-existence) of grammar instruction in the high school or grade schools. Surely, many of the teachers in those schools are the same people fingered by the report. Perhaps, then, the poor instruction in the schools is, like the existence of illiteracy at the universities, just another symptom of a grander malaise.

Although this is but second-hand knowledge, I do not doubt the report I once heard which stated that on the average, every Canadian reads only one book per year. Hard to believe! It seems even worse, then, when we consider that for everyone who reads seventy-five or one hundred books each year, there are seventy-five or one hundred people who read no books.

Perhaps we should form secret police squads to go about the countryside smashing television screens. Perhaps not, for there is obviously no simple solution. I can only reiterate one man's opinion that it is disturbing and disheartening to learn that the language skills of the students in one of the best universities in one of the most literate countries in the world are so pitifully deficient.

Bugs and barristers

by Jim Klein

I had occasion to talk this week with a friend, a criminal lawyer, about the recent barrister's room wiretap in Sault Ste. Marie. A local lawyer, Frank Shunock, was convicted of a drug offence on evidence gathered largely from the tapping of two courthouse phones regularly used in solicitor-client conversations.

Other unrelated conversations from the same phones remain recorded on extraneous, though by no means harmless segments of tape still in RCMP possession.

The potential uses and legality of these readings directed our discussions to the issues of legal jurisprudence, police ethics, the discretion of judges, a minister's powers, and the law itself.

Apparently least wronged by the bugging was the actual defendant.

Even the disputed legality of tapping a public phone is an academic issue, given the admissibility of such evidence when obtained (as it was) under a judge's order. Lawyer-client confidentiality is, I was told, largely a red herring in the case.
That the police would record the conversations of a solicitor
"engaged in or counselling a criminal act" is merely recognition that the man has by then removed himself from the protection of jurisprudence.

The other lawyers--and hopefully to a greater extent their clients--may have something to squawk about. "Sure, the police would know" (about the possible value of the other calls), "they're playing game if they say otherwise." While there is no admissible evidence involved, this prior knowledge might suggest some intent, and hence culpability, on the part of investigating officers.

Suits citing invasion of privacy are very real possibilities--civil actions are increasingly a check against overzealousness in policing.

On the existence of ethics among police, I was assured that "some have ethics....most do, in fact" with the lament that those without ethics can "conduct witch-hunts."

"I have never once seen the form or attended the hearing authorizing a wiretap", was the response to my question as to the judge's part in all this. Specific addresses are not now required, though "laxity" was ascribed to judges who would not request them. The law itself would seem most flawed in this case.

Attorney-General McMurtry, in politely requesting that the other tapes be destroyed, acknowledged that he could not order this done.
To have been more demanding might have merely flaunted his lack of power in the matter. Again critical analysis centres on the present law or, if you will, "the" system--bang your head against the brick wall of your choice.

The Shunock story is amazingly "badly cast." What remains when you leave a lawyer to the mercy of a court, a judge open to judging, and Roy McMurtry to uncharacteristically implore?
Policemen who would omit ethics in their search for complete knowledge of a case are left to engineer what at least one man labels "a complete abuse of the process".

From JD's Desk

by Paul Dale Mollen

Amidst the hullabaloo concerning the recently published report on "The Queen's English" it seems entirely appropriate to ask "What is the purpose of an undergraduate education?"

The report indicates that written and spoken communication among Queen's students is of an appallingly poor quality. Students read, write and speak English badly. One's first reaction is that Queen's must not demand much from its undergrads if these students have not yet mastered the fundamental skills. Further reflection, however, must indict the primary and secondary schools, and parents, for not adequately teaching basic language skills. The university certainly has a role to play in this area, but it should be one of honing and polishing skills learned earlier in a student's life. The university should have students practicing and habitualizing intellectual skills;
analytical and procedural skills which will forever be the tools of the individual.

The university has another clear responsibility. That is, to familiarize students with the basic issues of their era; to give substantial information in order that each person may cope with the important social decisions he or she will face. This university seems not to have consciously dealt with what Dr. J.A. Corry has called the "pressing obligation to study and to teach how society is to cope with accelerating social change, how technological developments...can help or hinder making this earth a garden for the human spirit...how to control the social impact of the massive organizations that use the new science and the new technology as the vehicle of their own advance."

The most important purpose of an undergraduate education is one which John Stuart Mill has outlined beautifully for us. It deals with the role of the educational system in developing moral, conscientious, wise humans. Mills says that public institutions for the study of professions and trades should exist, but that these should be used only AFTER a person becomes educated.
"Men are men before they are lawyers, or physicians, or merchants, or manufacturers; and if you make them capable and sensible men, they will make themselves capable and sensible lawyers or physicians. What professional men should carry away with them from a University is not professional knowledge, but that which should direct their professional knowledge, and bring the light of general culture to illuminate the technicalities of a special pursuit." This abhorrence of Mills' towards purposeless training and "blinkered specialization" is shared by many powerful and creative men: Karl Marx, Buckminster Fuller, Jacob Bronowski, C.
Wright Mills are a few of these, and let us not forget our own Dr. Corry, and this year's Brockington visitor,
J.K. Galbraith.

An undergraduate education should enable one to form a framework of values with which he or she may challenge the prevailing order, in order to improve it.

Is there any reason for you to be so surprised

by Gerry Lewarne

There were many people who were very surprised at the newspaper headlines that proclaimed that only 39 percent of first year Queen's students could express themselves properly. You really shouldn't be, given the recent history of the Ontario education system.

When Bill Davis became Education Minister back in 1967, he started what turned out to be a fundamental change in Ontario's education system. At the time, it was believed that education was the great equalizer of men. It was (and still is) believed that the whole of society would benefit if more people could be better educated. The problem before the 1960's was that too many people from poor and ethnic families were dropping out of the school system when they reached the age of 16. Mr. Davis hypothesized that the reason for the high dropout rate was that many students did not like the emphasis that was placed on the apparently useless and difficult disciplines of English and Mathematics. Consequently, he and many other Ontario educators decided that those courses should be offered as options rather than as required courses. In some schools a certain number of English credits were still required but these could be gained by taking Theatre Arts courses.

One effect of this change has been somewhat misrepresented by the newspapers across the land in the last few days. Professor Norman's report does find that literacy levels are what he would conclude as being low. The report also finds that of a sample of faculty from Arts and Science, about 45 percent said either that literacy levels had not changed or had risen.

The question you must ask is, does it matter if people can speak the "Queen's English"? If yes, then how much does it matter? Should we allow only those people whom Professor Norman calls "potentially literate" and "reasonably literate" into university? That would cut out

34 percent of the first-year students.

One thing that could be done about this problem is to have Queen's offer a remedial course which the "potentially literate," "semi-literate" and "illiterate" would have to take to get into second year.
One English professor whom I know believes that university is not the place for such a course. There is also the problem of financial constraints.
Another solution would be to have the secondary schools take care of the problem. However, as one member of the History faculty put it,
"High-school teachers are already harassed to the point of rebellion".

I propose that we do nothing about the problem other than publicize it to the high-school students. There is no lack of opportunities for both the high school and university student if he wishes to improve his English. If the proper use of English is considered important in our society then those who will not help themselves (and are aware of their problem) do not deserve to have the same opportunities available to others in this hypothesized society.

All washed up

Dear Editor:

Concerning the letter in last week's Journal from "two irritated females", how quickly we jump to conclusions.
The two women, citizens of Kingston, had water thrown on them from a passing car and assumed it was done by students. I, on the same night, had water thrown at me from a passing car (it missed, fortunately) and I assumed it was done by young people from Kingston. Most likely, either their conclusion or mine is wrong. New conclusion: they were splashed by young people from Kingston, and I was splashed, in retaliation, by the "two irritated females"

Sensible approach to tobacco problem

Adapted from an article by David Horn

Cigarette smoking may well represent the largest single health problem about which we have the power to do something immediately.

This silly little habit that we have accepted for so many years as an unimportant minor vice has suddenly turned into a monster, and we are hooked—as individuals and as a society. A smoker of a pack a day takes about 60,000 puffs a year. Our society is saddled with a mammoth industry, a large farm crop, a source of revenue to government and an important customer of our communications media. How did we get ourselves into this predicament?

Throughout history people everywhere have searched for natural products in their environment which would provide them not only with sustenance and shelter but certain pleasurable effects as well. In his search for gratification man has experimented with things to drink, sniff, smoke, chew or swallow—coca leaf, betel nut, tobacco, alcohol, mushrooms, poppy, hemp and cactus plants, among others. These have been found, indeed, to act on the nervous system.

Due to the feelings these substances induce people have been drawn to them and have become addicted and habituated to them. Nevertheless, some of the pleasure-giving habits have turned out to carry effects which have reduced their appeal and eventually died out. To understand how this can happen it is important to consider not only the personal gratifications involved but social, cultural and economic forces which reinforce behavior.

Snuff-taking enjoyed a long vogue before it went into eclipse. In England it became a mark of social elegance, and gave rise to such accoutrements as ornamented snuff boxes, snuff spoons, and snuff-carrying canes. Eventually, the glamor eventually wore off, and the more outspoken began to criticize snuffing as an idle and dirty habit.

There are interesting parallels between snuffing in England and tobacco chewing in the United States. Like snuffing, tobacco chewing enjoyed great popularity, penetrating into every phase and aspect of public life. More tobacco was chewed than smoked in the United States until the cigarette came along.

A tremendous change took place in the 60 to 70 years it took for tobacco chewing to decline. The habit produced a counter revolution. Even in 1883, when chewing was at its height, the handwriting was on the wall. In that year, the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal attacked chewers as "a national disgrace," and then made this comment: "As great as this evil still is, however, we believe that it has already lessened, and will continue to grow less as social refinement becomes more widespread."

The Journal was a little premature in its prediction. It was more than a decade later before the "evil" began to lessen. Nor was "social refinement" the only factor leading to its decline. Beside esthetic factors—the bulging cheek, the stained teeth, the spittle—health factors were involved. TB campaigns against spitting, legal restrictions against spitting on the sidewalk or other public places also had an effect. These were among the factors that converged in producing the appearance, in 1910, of a substitute for the "evil"—the cheap and attractive cigarette. A new population and a new social system helped to establish the new substitute

Both Horn
THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL

Cigarettes are used everywhere by adults and young people, by men and women. It is a socially acceptable habit and yet, oddly, most smokers are uncomfortable about one or another aspect of their smoking. Nevertheless, millions of men and women in Canada continue to smoke and young people take it up at the rate of more than a million a year. Smoking is a form of gratification, behavior, for these millions of people, but when this behavior introduces serious consequences a conflict arises which must be resolved. It is the resolution of this conflict to which we are all addressing ourselves.

The initiation of smoking and similarly the cessation of smoking depend on cultural, psychological and social factors. Essentially four elements enter into these behaviors:

1. The reasons that go into starting—or not starting—smoking. Similarly, the reasons for giving up smoking—or not giving it up. Cultural factors play an important role here, because one's values are critical in determining the outcome. How important is health to the individual? How does smoking relate to other goals of the individual that may be achieved or denied if one smokes?

2. The perception of the health threat. We are only too aware of the many gaps in knowledge and behavior, for these millions of people, but when this behavior introduces serious consequences a conflict arises which must be resolved. It is the resolution of this conflict to which we are all addressing ourselves.

3. The psychological use to which smoking is put. People are using the cigarette in one or more of the following affect management classes: to increase positive feelings—such as stimulation, sensori-motor manipulation, or pleasurable relaxation, to decrease negative feelings—that is, to help cope with feelings of anxiety, distress, shame, etc.; habit smoking in which the affective component has been lost, and psychological addition which is an organized pattern of alternating an increase of positive feelings with a decrease of negative feelings.

4. Social factors which facilitate or inhibit either continuing smoking, or continued success as a non-smoker. Here social forces, interpersonal influences, mass communications, and the role of key groups all can play an important part. We must face up to the fact that the cigarette caught hold because it fulfilled certain functions that needed to be fulfilled for a great many people. In fulfilling these functions, though, the average user of cigarettes, even the "less than average" consumer of cigarettes is abusing the product and subject to serious effects. It is not just the two, three or four pack a day smoker who is hurt by his behavior.

Since the problem is behavioral in origin, much of the solution will have to come from a behavioral approach. The values that are important to non-smoking must be stressed over those which are met by smoking; clear and accurate perception of the threat must be achieved through appropriate substitutes; and the weight of social forces from personal forces to institutional forces must be squarely in support of our efforts.

Our task with the cigarette consuming public is clear:

* We must get people to stop ignoring the problem.

* Then we must get them to initiate the action to stop.

* We must maximize the short term success—find the ways to help them through the initial period without cigarettes.

* We must maximize long term success by establishing a climate in which the ex-smoker has no desire to return to his former habits.

The problem is complex, and complex problems require complex solutions. The problem will not be solved by an ingenious gimmick. Beware of the person who says, I have a procedure, or a device, or a simple substitute or a poster of a film which will solve the problem. A variety of human reactions are tied up in the smoking habit, and a variety of control methods will be needed to solve it.

Focus on plagiarism: Why & Wherefore

by Judith Plotz

Twenty Research Papers are submitted in one freshman composition section; nine are plagiarized. A sharp-eyed history professor, disheartened by yearly bumper crops of plagiarists, gives up on the term paper: "I even have graduate students do annotated bibliographies now." An allegedly original English paper is submitted bearing a fresh top-sheet over the unaltered text of a roommate's year-old paper, unaltered even to the roommate's name and the original instructor's comments and grade.

These are representative examples of university life in the '70s, where plagiarism is epidemic. The academic community has proffered a number of explanations for the plague, each more dismal than the last. The general decline in moral standards is a recurrent theme. The students, one argument goes, are intellectually corrupt; growing up in unearned ease, they have never learned to respect the hard-earned achievements of intellect. Or, more vastly, the nation is corrupt and has taught its children to seek success at any price. Alternatively, or additionally, the university is corrupt in employing a judgmental grading system that encourages students to jockey for grades rather than to seek truth. Less moralistically, others trace the problem to a presumed drop in standards of admissions. Traditional university programs demand too much of poorly prepared students, who plagiarize out of panic.

These explanations may account for some cases, but not all. Actually, the very concept of plagiarism, a relatively new phenomenon, has grown up with modern ideas of individuality.

In the Medieval and Renaissance periods, the concept of plagiarism—the illegitimate borrowing from another author—was virtually unknown. With the exception of direct comma-for-comma copying of another writer's work, most sorts of borrowing were legitimate, even laudable. To model one's style, one's plots, one's ideas on a literary master was the time honored way of learning to write well. One rather boasted of than tried to hide one's appropriations from the masters.

Plagiarism first came into existence as a significant literary problem only toward the end of the 17th century. Critics of this period held that all the major subjects for literature had already been pre-empted, seized upon by writers of genius when the world was young, when "nature," as Samuel Johnson said of Shakespeare, "was still open" to them. But a favorite Latin tag of the age, "praeterea qui ante nos nostra dixerunt" (Damn those who had all our best ideas before we did), captures the increasing discontent with this situation. Eighteenth-century writers, despite their traditionalism, also felt an envious esteem for originality, the power to look at something in a new way, and for invention, the power to discover a new subject.

It was during this period of reluctant traditionalism and longing for originality that critics began fervently to hunt down plagiarists. Whether out of thirst for originality or out of an aggrieved desire to show originality impossible to anyone, critics began to make accusations of plagiarism against writers who did no more than echo a word or phrase from an earlier writer. The failure to be original became culpable only when originality became desirable.

By the Romantic age plagiarism should have become unnecessary. The early 19th-century Romantics took a high view of the potential creativity of every human soul. Originality, they argued, is the birthright of every individual. So liberating, so anti-authoritarian a theory of creativity should have set a writer free from the necessity of literary theft. Yet the greatest plagiarist in literary history, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, is a product of the age of originality. Coleridge compulsively appropriated the materials of other writers, notably German critics and philosophers, and equally compulsively protested his absolute originality.

Like Coleridge, contemporary undergraduates labor under a double burden: the burden of originality imposed by the age and the burden of intellectual coherence imposed by the university. That the burdens often prove intolerable, the present state of academic morality attests. Since creativity comes from the self, it is no longer necessary to furnish that self with facilitating knowledges (grammar, German, Latin, calculus, physics) and forms (syntax, the sonnet, the book report). With "writing" in secondary schools largely confined to English class and with English dedicated to evoking individual creativity, students are losing the habit of unselfconscious writing as a means of communication, as a mechanical knack in which the deepest self is not necessarily involved.

Parallel with the development of a solipsistic idea of originality has been the knowledge explosion. The first-hand knowledge of any individual, even if he has the curiosity of a Leonardo and the stamina of a Casanova, is puny beside the vast stores of genuine scholarship that are piling up with unprecedented speed and to an unprecedented density in our libraries. Even a seasoned scholar feels intimidated by the mass of materials he must master and comprehend.

When a student is asked to write an essay synthesizing or assessing literary or historical or political data, he finds himself facing materials on which considerable authoritative commentary may already exist. To write a good essay, the student must digest the data and commentary, synthesize them, and then go beyond them. The process, once second nature to well-trained college students, has by now become remarkably difficult for them. My guess is that the act of writing is increasingly tied up with the idea of self-expression and has little connection with the comprehension of any external aspect of the world.

If plagiarism does derive from a perverted ideal of creativity, is there anything at all the university can do?

The quick way to abolish the problem, of course, is to abolish term papers; but this is decapitation for a headache. The problem goes so deep that individual actions may be only palliative, but some new approaches to writing might help. In order to combat the association between the act of writing and self-expression, I suggest that numerous small exercises be demanded—Quizzes, summaries, paraphrases—all cast in consecutive prose. I also suggest the revival of the deliberate imitation, an educational device so old, so aboriginal as to be new.

With exercises and imitations encouraging impersonal prose, major paper assignments might be made more personal. One might even try tapping the tremendous energy of animus, of anger, and ask students to write on those aspects of subjects they find most objectionable.

One might, one might... In any case, one must. The increasing inability of students to leap the gap between their sole selves and the realm of knowledge means that it is vital to build more bridges, more crossings to ease the passage.

Rodgers and Washington

Folk this weekend

by Davis Eagle

This weekend promises to be a big one as far as folk music is concerned with two top notch acts coming into town. At the Scarecrow Stan Rodgers will be making his third appearance in two years. His audience has grown considerably since he first played here and has come to expect a good time from him. Judging from what I saw this summer at the London Folk Festival, they will not be disappointed. Rodgers has been writing a bag full of new material to go with his 'soon-to-be' classic tunes of the maritimes. Stan Rodgers is a very large person and has a very large voice to match so it is natural that he sings roof-raisers like "Down in Fogherly's Cove" or Hank Williams' "Lovesick Blues", but what is almost eerie is that he can maintain the soft touch required for a sensitive song such as his own "Rodden Hills". Stan will be backed up by his brother Garnet who plays flute and violin, and David Woodhouse who replaces Jim Ogilvie on bass. This is the tightest three-piece you're likely to hear this year so don't miss them.

Jackie Washington will be doing the job at Bitter Grounds this Saturday night and if easy, low-down good times are what you're after, this man has had the practise in giving them. I saw and consequently met Jackie this summer and found him to be as relaxed on stage as off, always giving the audience the full consideration of his fifty-odd years of playing the blues. Although he has been around for so long and has played with such greats as Lonnie Johnson, his style and presentation have a distinctly contemporary feel to them, never giving one an old-hat impression of what is at heart a traditional idiom. I think that this is the first time he has played at Queen's, but unless I miss my guess, it won't be the last.

Reviewers wanted

The Journal Arts section is looking for people to review classical music concerts and happenings in Kingston. There will be many diversified presentations this year both on and off campus. If you are interested please drop your name off at the Journal office in the Student's Union basement or call us at 547-2606.

Films at Queen's

Five Easy Pieces will be showing this Friday, October 1 at 8 p.m. in Ellis Hall. Everyone's heard of this one - the film which launched Jack Nicholson of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest fame on the road to stardom. The production is one of the first of the popular new American intellectual-search films.

On Saturday October 2, Love Me Tonight will play at 8 p.m. in Ellis Hall. Love Me Tonight is a delightful Rogers and Hart musical comedy made in 1932, starring Jeannette MacDonald and Maurice Chevalier. The film has been described as the "height of comedy".

Cartoons which do not especially consider children, the Fleischer Bros. Show will be shown in Ellis Hall on Wednesday, October 6 at 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. as part of the "Hollywood Cartoon Series". The films, which include Popeye and Betty Boop, are subtly suggestive as is characteristic of the times. Prices for all three evenings are $2.00 for students and $1.50 for senior citizens.

These are Performing Arts Department of Film Studies presentations.

Nocturne:

More than just rock

This week will take a look at one of the more popular programme areas at CFRC — Nocturne. When one hears or thinks of Nocturne the immediate synonym that comes to mind is Rock. However, anyone who has tuned in to Nocturne recently, may have been surprised to hear other variations on this theme. Not only can you hear good ol' rock and roll, but also a mixture of light rock, folk-rock, jazz-rock, country-rock (not to be confused with country and western), electronic rock, plus male and female vocalists.

The principle behind presenting such a diverse format is that Nocturne is both an entertaining and educating experience. Not only may you hear forms of music with which you weren't familiar, but also artists and albums, both old and new, which you did not know existed. This is one aspect of Nocturne and CFRC that you can't obtain from the top-40 stations in the area. Furthermore, every Sunday evening from midnight until 2 a.m. Nocturne presents features on selected artists.

Another specialized area of CFRC—Nocturne is the presentation of taped concerts. If you missed an artist when he was performing in the Kingston area, you may be able to hear the concert, usually accompanied by a taped interview with the artist. Permission to use such tapes is required from the artist, and therefore we cannot promise to be able to air every show. For your convenience both the features and the taped concert productions will be advertised in the Journal.

At pre-arranged dates throughout the year, Nocturne will also present special features (2 to 4 hours in length) on selected artists, or particular trends in rock music.

Hopefully, CFRC will be taping the Dan Hill concert Saturday October 2, and will air it later on during the year. We did tape the recent David Bromberg Band concert. Watch for the date of broadcast.

Nocturne can be heard Thursday through Sunday evening from 10 p.m. until midnight on CFRC—AM 1490, and from midnight until 2 a.m. on both AM and FM 91.9. In the wee hours of Sunday morning from 2 till 5 a.m. the Nocturne request show is heard, giving everyone a chance to hear their favourite artists and record. Simply call us at 547-6677 during this time, and your request will be played. Every Sunday from 4 p.m. until 7:30 p.m., you may hear forms of Nocturne programming on Kaleidoscope, a programme which presents a variety of contemporary music and comedy.

In summary Nocturne illustrates the parameterless dimensions of contemporary rock music. Nocturne—more than just rock, from CFRC.

Sitting on a snake rail fence...

Eric Hughes

Tuesday night I laughed and cried - I shook with both mirth and melancholy at the Brewery Lane Theatre where Theatre 5 is performing their "Sittin' on a Snake Rail Fence." The delight and involvement of the other members of the small audience matched mine. I will freely admit that a Kleenex concession in the theatre lobby would make a welcome handsome profit.

"Sittin' on a Snake Rail Fence" is a show about old Ontario. Within the framework of a travelling medicine show we meet a cast of endearing and appealing characters whose life stories are acted out for us. We travel through farming, politics, religion, entertaining, and simply life itself in an Ontario that, while it may be dormant, lives on in the minds of the elderly, Theatre 5 and finally, the audience. We are brought face to face with the down-to-earth excitement of the turn of the century election, the loneliness of early Ontario spinsterhood (and its possible complications,) and the horrors of World War One (the soldiers dying "so young"). Finally we fall out of our chairs laughing at the medicine show cast's version of an exciting and "tempestuous" melodrama (superbly written by (Diane Gordon)).

Although "Snake Rail Fence" has been performed previously, it has never been done by this particular cast, or completely in its present version, so I can safely say that Tuesday was opening night - and what an opening. The show (after an initial stiffness) was TIGHT. Each skit moved gracefully and coherently into the next. Timing was right on. Enthusiasm was in abundance - and so was energy. The cast was working hard at doing what they like - entertaining, and they accomplished this end in grand style.

Gord Robertson, Val Robertson, Theresa Sears, David Switzer and John Taylor are a team. None tries to outshine the others. Each has his own individual presence, personality and strengths. Perhaps this is the secret to the success of the show. As each actor finds his 'moments', he takes the stage with a pleasantly palatable confidence that smacks of neither forwardness nor false reticence. They want to be good, and we're glad that they are.

The variety of the show is impressive. Commemorating World War One is the Honour Roll of dead from K.C.V.I., 1918, read with various theatrical techniques that create a mood of sad and reluctant acceptance. On top of this is a moving letter from a soldier-sculptor on the front dealing with his experiences of death and of trying to mold life from a lump of clay dug out of a fox hole. The scene does not become maudlin, but retains a quiet countenance that underscores the violence inherent in the situation.

The previously mentioned second act melodrama is an uproariously funny concoction of missed cues, wrong entrances and grossly exaggerated situations - timed to perfection, and to the audience's delight. It was so obvious that the actors were enjoying themselves that I almost forgot I was in a theatre, and felt as if we were all at one big party - cracking up at the antics of new friends.

I have only one criticism to make of the production and this deals with the performance of the music between some of the skits. Thomas Handy is a fine guitarist, but his singing style borders on the somnambulist. He has witty lyrics to sing. Use them! Make the words come alive for the audience and we'll listen for hours.

What more can I say? There is an evening of great entertainment no further from campus than any of the movie houses on Princess Street. Besides that, its more entertaining than many of the films I've seen lately, and it's live! Go out and see it! "Sittin' on a Snake Rail Fence" is playing until Saturday night at the Brewery Lane Theatre, 370 King Street West. Curtain time is 8:30.

They've got it, but . . .

Watson and Reynolds need time

by Davis Eagle

I'm going to have trouble with this review about Watson and Reynolds because while I feel I should be fairly critical about their performance last Friday night at Scarecrow, I don't want to give the impression that I didn't like them or think that they're bad musicians. Actually they have the potential to become exceptional in every musical respect (the operative word here being potential), in other words, they've got "it".

Right now their difficulties are in technical presentation which stem largely from their instrumental versatility. Watson plays piano, flute and guitar. Reynolds plays cello, mandolin as well as flute and guitar. They employ almost all of the possible combinations of these which makes the mixing extremely difficult, and the overall mix suffered accordingly. Also, the switching of instruments caused rather long delays between songs and unfortunately, their between song patter was not able to bridge the gap so that there was a definite break in the flow. This was noticeable to the audience and destroyed some of the effectiveness of their material. Both women sing and combine full harmonies with an interchanging of lead parts in mid-song which is quite effective, but the technique is over-used and produces a sameness of sound in their vocals. As well, Reynolds' voice is much the stronger of the two and in some songs upsets the mix. Overall the instrumental work was superior to their singing, especially the piano-cello combination with the cello giving an almost classical touch. The instrumental superiority was evident in the majority of their songs which suffered from what were rather weak lyrics. A case in point was a song called "Searching For The Sun" which aside from the lyrics could have been their best song. Perhaps their diversity, or maybe divergence in styles caused a certain lack of togetherness in a number of pieces and could have been fatal except for their obvious talent.

One must remember that both of them are quite young and that technical flaws can be amended (pompous as that must sound). The masters say that you've got to end with the best and the final song of the evening. "Renaissance Man" was exactly that. They had obviously worked on this tone poem so that it shone; it was indication enough of what they will do given time, and not very much time at that.

Bitter Grounds

Policy Change

Due to complaints of high admission charges and the policy of compulsory membership cards, Bitter Grounds would like to announce a change of admission policy. Most costs have been reduced, and membership is now optional.

For those who would like to be members, the cost of membership has been increased to $1.00, and the admission charge for members has been reduced from $2.50 to $2.25. Though the initial cost of attending Bitter Grounds remains at $3.25 for members, the cost of successive visits has been reduced to the admission price charged last year. Members will compensate for the cost of membership after two visits to Bitter Grounds. Third and subsequent visits will result in a 50c per week saving ($2.25 versus $2.75) as compared to non-members who will be charged an intermediate price of $2.75. This is a reduction from the original cost of $3.25.

The Queen's Journal, Friday, October 1, 1976

Oscar PetersonSolo concert should be fine jazz

Oscar Peterson, Canada's best known musician for non-Canadians, will perform two solo concerts in Grant Hall, Wednesday night, October 6. Recently awarded a Queen's honorary degree, he returns now to perform for a younger and hopefully as appreciative audience as viewed him at this past summer's convocation.

Born in Montreal in the early 20's, he learned the jazz basics playing for others and leading his own bands. He made his U.S. debut in 1949 in Carnegie Hall, when, in the words of the Downbeat magazine review, "he stopped the concert dead in its tracks." Since then he has rewarded and played with giants of the jazz world, the likes of Louis Armstrong, Coleman Hawkins and Billie Holiday. Although for the last ten years or so he has preferred to front a trio, he has given solo performances increasingly often.

Enjoying wide international popularity that has brought him critical acclaim, he was the winner of the first Downbeat readers poll, an honest indication of a musician's standing in the jazz community, and has won that honour many times since. To those less familiar with jazz, he has won acclaim in the Playboy's reader's poll, a sure sign of his standing among casual listeners, and among those to whom jazz is a chic commodity like a new Corvette, Oscar Peterson is the essential pianist.

Canadian jazz pianist Oscar Peterson will play two concerts at Grant Hall Wednesday, October 6th.

Of his music, Peterson is seen as a master of technique, par excellence, the successor to Art Tatum, considered to be a "wizard of technical expertise". His music teams with asides and comments, with fantastic embellishments and he himself has the unique ability to take whatever is in a song and blow into it a new, bigger-than-life sharp. Of his own playing, Peterson has said "Technique is something you use to make your ideas listenable."

It is the ideas that one utilizes instinctively that determine the degree of profundity any artist reaches.

And yet, not all criticism of his playing has been laudatory. It has been said of Peterson that his playing has accentuated technical mastery at the expense of imaginative renderings. He has been characterized as an elaborator, blowing up whatever is in a song, which in and of itself is no small accomplishment, even though it is quite a separate art from the business that most jazz pianists are about. In his defense, Peterson has said "Craftsmanship is essential to captivity and good performance."

Certainly, even though the question of technical expertise versus creativity can't be resolved to the satisfaction of everyone, nonetheless the performance on Wednesday night, coupled with Oscar Peterson's reputation, should help a lot.

Is the hype hurting Dan Hill?

Sandy Graham

"Lord don't let this crazy world
Make a jukebox out of me
Let the songs keep flowing Strong and naturally"

Brave and encouraging words they were when I first heard them last fall. The lyrics of a new singer valiantly dedicating himself and his music to complete honesty. His quiet, unpretentious acoustic guitar and grainy yet mellow voice suited his simple style. He admitted finding something romantic in the image of the solo performer coming onstage, battered guitar in hand. Having nothing to hide behind, he challenged the audience to accept his personality as is. Many found the directness of the songs on his first album almost embarrassing. Who was this singer who had stolen their innermost feelings and put them on record for millions to hear?

The man I'm referring to is, of course, Dan Hill, who will be at Grant Hall this Saturday for two performances. But when he takes the stage he's going to have to convince me all over again of his sincerity. Since his last concert at Queen's he has become something of a legend, a favourite son of an over-zealous Canadian music press. Dan Hill now seems to have a reputation as perhaps the biggest recipient of hype this country has ever seen. It's hard to blame Hill for his predicament though. After all, to the eye of a seasoned journalist his life story is the stuff of legends. He picks up a guitar (he's never given one and never, ever takes lessons) and straightway finds himself absent-mindedly strumming along to the radio. Of course he drops out of high school, manages to sign a recording contract and proceeds to blow the deal when he finds his aspirations don't match those of his employers. After months of one-night stands, he is discovered at Toronto's Riverboat. Shortly afterwards helpful friends wrangle him some studio time...and so the story goes.

The question is, why hasn't Hill been able to resist the barrage? His extreme sensitivity may be the answer. He makes a point of emphasizing this on his first album, conceding his naivety while insisting that he still believes in people. Cute but hard to accept especially if one listens to his second release, Hold On. Here we find a total absence of the personality that was supposed to be his trademark. Once the champion of the "voice, guitar and stage" theory of presentation, he buries lacklustre melodies under needless and annoying orchestrations. The vocals are cool and restrained, almost mechanical. Hold On would suggest that Hill's debut image was false, only the appealing creation of some record company executive. However I suspect that an element of deceit has been involved in the recording of each album. At any rate much more than his first release Hold On seems just too contrived to be believable. One song, "Caroline" provides an overly convenient vehicle for Hill to discuss his success. "And all that success means is just money and confusion". It's as if he is trying to prove his honesty. I would suggest that Hill, surprised as much as anyone by his phenomenal popularity was overwhelmed by it all, and tried too hard to make Hold On a carbon copy of his first record. But copying kills the natural progression of an artist, and renders music produced in this manner sterile and meaningless.

The real reason Dan Hill has been so thoroughly gone over in the media is his amiability and his acceptance of anything written about him. I for one would love to see him get angry...really fighting mad. Anger is the only emotion Hill hasn't shown on his albums. Until he does, can we really regard him as the total singer he probably is? Dan Hill must grow and expand just like everyone else, showing us his strengths as well as his weaknesses. None of the rest of us can go on playing our greatest hits forever.

Queen's Track Shaping Up Well

Mike Gouinlock

Bews began this past week with the Tug O'War and Monsterball competitions again kicking off the year. Without taking anything away from M.B.A.'s convincing Tug O' War victory (report next week) four really important team sports get underway next Monday. Heading into the season the latest Las Vegas odds go as follows: In Flag Football, Arts '77 are 9-to-5 picks to retain the championship they won last year. They boast an experienced and explosive offence and a defence that yielded a mere 12 points last season in eight games. At 2-to-2 are the Bus Grads who should provide some bruising games. They are strong on both the offensive and defensive lines and have Jake Muir at quarterback. Muir is a wily veteran much in the mould of Fran Tarkenton but like Tarkenton has yet to win the big one. Commerce 79 goes at 4-to-1 but lacks playoff experience and PHE goes at 5-to-1. The sleeper in this sport could be Meds. They might be sipping champagne in early November.

In Rugged the competition should be much closer since defending champs Commerce 76 have graduated however, by the end of the season PHE should have another championship under its belt. They could receive stiff competition from Commerce 79 but 79 is probably still a year away from a championship in this sport.

The Soccer final in November should be a rematch of last year's game. Both Civil and Arts 78 are strong, however the edge should go to Civil. Despite losing Shapiro to the Gaels they still have Ash, Boone, Scottish rookie Shearer and Paul Scizinski back after a try-out with the NASL. The sleeper in this sport says Jimmy the Greek is 74-75 champs Arts 77.

In Softball Arts 77 should repeat provided they maintain the great Queen's track team is dy-no-mite!

Queen's hosted the first track meet of the Intercollegiate season on Saturday, September 25, at Richardson Stadium. If this meet was an indication of the rest of the season, the Queen's team should do well, even without the expertise of coach, Rolf Lund, who is on sabbatical this year. No team scores were kept, but nevertheless, Queen's Track walked away victorious. The most notable victories for Queen's came in the mens' 400 metre event, and the mens' 5000 metres. In the 400, Queen's entered 6 competitors and they all finished in the top 10! Tim Page won the event in a time of 49.4 seconds, followed by Vic Gooding (50.3) and Tony Verhoeven (50.7) in second and third. Jeff Gioles and Len Stone placed fifth and sixth, and Steacy Merritt was ninth. The other sweep, in the 5000 metres, was led by Mike Deguido winning in a time of 15:57.0. Roger Wheathe and Duncan Rogerson finished in second and third, clocking times of 15:58.4 and 16:10.2, respectively. Dave Grant had a time of 16:50.8, good enough for seventh spot.

There were many more outstanding efforts from other members of the team. Marc Macaulay was first in the 400 metre hurdles (55.2 seconds) and second in the 110 metre hurdles tying the time of the first place finisher, with 15.3 seconds. Rick Forsayeth was sixth in the 110 metre hurdles. Dale Friessen came through in a time of 4:19.0 for a first place finish in the 1500 metres. Duncan Card placed fourth in the 100 metres clocking 11.4 seconds. Brian Arthur finished sixth in that race, and Tom Saunders was ninth. Rookie Jim Morrisson had two fourth-place finishes in the 110 metre hurdles and 400 metre hurdle races.

To go along with his third in the 400, Tony Verhoeven had two first place finishes in the javelin and the discus. Mark Evans had a third in discus and second in shot. Peter Becke leaped 6.21 metres in long jump for second spot and Al Monks was fourth with 5.87 metres. Mike Forsayeth was fourth in the high jump.

The women's team also displayed fine form, as Sue Spence, Lynn Andrews, Lee Anne Poland, and Sue Plummer, finished third, fourth, fifth and sixth in the 1500 metres. Miss Spence recorded a time of 4:55.2 and the other times were 5:40.1, 5:43.0, and 5:50.5. Beth Buckingham recorded a personal best with a second place finish, and a time of 11:52.0 in the 3,000 metres. Jan Pipe and Kathy Cook placed fifth and sixth in the 400 metres. Their times were 61 B and 65.1 seconds. Lynn Souter ran to sixth spot in the 100 metres. Jean Dietrich, a newcomer to Queen's Track, placed second in the high jump, with a height of 1.55 metres, and also came fifth in shotput. Karen Rahn tossed the discus 30.72 metres, for first, and was fourth in shotput. Sue Sisson was third in the discus.

In the relays events, the men excelled themselves. Although there was no first-place finish, Queen's B team was second, Queen's C team was second, Queen's C team was third and Queen's A team was fourth. In the women's relay, Queen's B team was fourth and Queen's A team managed to grab fifth.

Golden grapplers gain great coach

Just one week ago the Queen's Wrestling Gaels were without a coach and there seemed to be no likely prospect to take the job. However, a very able coach has now been found in Roy Worthington who is now working in the Kingston area for MacLachlan Lumber in the restoration of log buildings.

Roy brings twelve years of wrestling knowledge to the Queen's mat. Originally, he wrestled for the very strong Mayor Daley Wrestling Club of Chicago which has consistently been a powerhouse in the American Freestyle and Greco-Roman Championships producing many members of the American Olympic teams such as Don Behm, Larry Kristoff and Doug Combs.

Roy has also won his share of laurels. Perhaps his greatest accomplishment came in 1969 when he won the American Greco-Roman Championships at 220 lbs. and also displayed his ability to compete in both styles by capturing a third place in the Freestyle Championship that year. For the last few years, Roy has worked in the Middle East for an oil company and as an artist and designer. Within that period of time, Roy was able to work out with many of the national teams in the Middle East area and gain a vast repertoire of new wrestling techniques. Most of his improved wrestling techniques were probably gained from the Iranian team which consistently produces many world champions. Coach Worthington played host to his first practice on Tuesday, September 29, in which he had eight rookies come out. The Queen's team has a very small nucleus of returning

by Brian Clarke

Never let it be said that Queen's University has not produced its fair share of top athletes and furthermore, never will it, and is continuing to do so.

Tony Verhoeven, who is in his second year en route to a Masters in Physical Education at Queen's, was, for a brief period last year, the Canadian record-holder in the decathlon.

Right now he is planning his future; a future which, if all things go well, could include the Commonwealth Games in 1978, the Pan American Games in '79, and to top it all off, the prestigious Olympic Games in '80.

"I was very pleased with my showing on Saturday", said Verhoeven. "I had a hard summer of training. I did four decathlons in five weeks. They recommend no more than every third. It took quite a bit out of me. I am really looking forward to this year though. I hope to break the Canadian record in the decathlon."

Jerry Morro of British Columbia is the present national record holder in the decathlon with 7,487 points. Verhoeven's best will have to better that.

When Verhoeven broke the Canadian record last year he accumulated 7,066 points at a competition in the United States. It was good enough to encourage him to compete in the Canadian Olympic Track and Field Trials.

The Olympic standard for the 1976 games was 7,650 points. No Canadian was able to meet that amount and consequently the selection committee decided not to enter a Canadian athlete in the decathlon competition.

Morro bettered Verhoeven's record soon after it was established but the Queen's University student still remains among the top competitors in the country.

"I have a four-year plan," said Verhoeven. "Everything's tentative but I would like very much to be at the Commonwealth Games in 1978, the Pan Ams in '79, and the Olympics in '80."

The strapping 6'3" Verhoeven was born in Holland, but first gained the competitive spirit as a high-school student at Cornwall's Dundas District High School where he was the grade 12 athletic champion of the school.

"I have a goal, just like all people have plans," said Verhoeven. "If it falls through, too bad, but at least I can say I tried and had fun. I'll make no bones about it though. I want to do well."

Alouettes enjoy the party

Tom Shand

If the story I am about to tell you is ever to achieve everlasting greatness in your memories of sports reports then you, my friends, must keep in mind one indisputable, time-tested observation which is that "Montrealers love nothing better than a good party."

As parties go, last Sunday's had to rank as one of Montreal's all-time liveliest. Jean Drapeau, chairman of the party hosts Hall of Fame, supplied the place while Sam Berger brought in the live entertainment. The party game is a new one for Berger who, in his fanaticism for football, which in turn has led to his unprecedented acts of financial masochism at a rate of some $300,000 per annum.

The guest list was open to all, however with only limited accommodation available. Reservations via ticket purchases were required, an offer which 68,505 people thought all too good to refuse. This record crowd was a highly "spirited" group and became even more aroused when their gladiators on the field began to perform beyond their wildest hopes or expectations.

The Alouettes (psyched up beyond recognition) led by club wielding Ah You and Widger, performed with the reckless abandon reminiscent of their play in their Grey Cup Years and completely annihilated the visiting Ottawans.

Offensively, credit for the 23 to 2 victory must be given to rookie Joe Barnes and also to the oft-chastised Canadian amateur football system which supplied ball handlers Moford, McCann, Smith, Aynesly, Dalla Riva and Dan Sweet to the starting offence. This corp of Canucks allowed Sweet to shatter the All-Pro record for consecutive field goals held by Stenerus and Cockcroft of the N.F.L., the league which ironically almost ruined the C.F.L. by moving into Montreal. "How Sweet it is" could be read on both the scoreboard and on the face of Berger who had been waiting a long time to see that sign light up.

The Olympic Stadium was not only the perfect place for the AL's housewarming party, but it is also far superior accommodation for sports, even to the problem-plagued Autostade or any other of the AL's past homes. The fans who filed out of the house that Drapeau built left with two memories, those of victory and of good times, which should uplift Sam Berger's spirits and help refill his pocket-book. These two ingredients must go hand-in-hand in order for Montrealers to support a team.

Unfortunately for the owners of Montreal sports teams, Montrealers do not have the patience to support a loser indefinitely as do Torontonians. Thus, while the Yanks were celebrating, the Expos could find little reason to raise cheer as they dropped a pair to the Phillies thereby completing their term of occupancy at Parc Jarry. It was a dismal year for the Expos, who join the ALs in the Olympic Stadium next year. The party never started at Jarry Park this year as the fans could no longer enjoy themselves in the stands, knowing of the utter incompetence of those before them on the field. Expos will need more than just la Stade Olympique to bring back the fans.

It appears as though the Alouettes have found the essential ingredient of victory at just the right time. Congratulations should be extended to Drapeau and Berger, who, together, threw one helluva bash. And remember Montrealers love nothing better than a good party.

Quacks? They enjoy it

as told to Tom Shand by Duk Hunter

Last Saturday marked the opening day of duck hunting season here in Ontario. Now, duck hunting being a sport I could never really come to grips with I figured on sending one of my roving reporters out to bring back the story of just what goes on out in those marshes in the wee hours of the morning. However, I made the mistake of picking a city fellow to do the chore and sure enough, you guessed it, he just couldn't get enthused enough about ducks at four in the morning to get out of bed. So I was left without a story on one of the highlights of an outdoorsmen's year, until I happened to run into my old pal, Duk Hunter. Now Duk, he knew I didn't think too much of duck hunting so he sat me down and he talked to me.

"Now, Mistah Shand, the first thing ya gotta understand is that half the fun of huntin' is gettin' everything ready for the big day. Ya get real excited, ya know. By the time ya get out your ol' duck huntin' coat, oil your gun, and bug your shells there's hardly a duck hunter who can get to sleep for the excitement.

After-ya eventually fall asleep it's only a few hours before you're up again. This is what separates the real hunter from the others cuz the real hunter knows when its time to git up. Its the kinda thing that just gets built into your head after awhile.

Now, about the next most important thing after gettin' up, is to make sure you got a good huntin' mate, who must also get up on time. You gotta remember you're gonna be out in some hole with this guy for a few hours so-ya want somebody who can talk to keep-ya awake but must be a quick shot so-ya don't miss the first shot cuz it's the most important (right then I knew Duk was rulin' out female hunters).

The next toughest thing is to find your hole cuz-ya gotta remember that it's darkest just before the dawn and the mist is often pretty heavy. This is no problem if you been goin' to a hole regular-like, but if you're goin' to somebody's place, ya-better make sure they know where you're goin'.

Once you got your decoys set up then-ya gotta wait for the ducks. This is where your timing's important cuz if-ya have-ta wait much more than half an hour some of your excitement starts to die and your head might start a-bobbin'.

I remember this happened to me once and when the ducks came I woke up so fast that I bit right through me pipe. It helps to stay awake or else if the ducks land you won't know which is them and which is your decoys. Them new styrofoam ones is real tricky cuz their heads turn in the wind. Somedays ya hit more decoys than ducks. Now Saturday wasn't so good. I had this city boy with me who took me to the wrong hole from where the ducks were too high and my gun only had a modified choke. Anyhow, I think the shootin' was better at night (sounds like the dayshift taxi driver talkin' about the night shift).

What's real funny on the first day is to see the guys who use last years pellets and then just when the best ducks come the pellets just fall out the end. I didn't do too much laughin' on Saturday; didn't get no ducks ya know. Funny thing 'bout the marsh when the ducks is fallin' there isn't a finer sight to be seen but when they're not it's gotta be about the worst day-a-your life. (Obviously Duk didn't want to say much more about his day).

Shand is that the hunters are the real protectors of ducks as only they really care about them. Hunting is regulated but it isn't the hunters who is fillin' in all the marshes and swamps. Ducks can't find a place to live anymore, that's the problem. Besides ducks are meat and so it saves a meal of some other meat an' I'll tell-ya secin' a pig or cow gettin' slaughtered ain't no pretty site either."

Well, Duk may or may not be right about the moral justification but one thing for sure, he really knows and loves his ducks. Myself, I'd rather leave their future in his hands than in those of some government official in charge of ecology and who really doesn't know what ducks are all about. Maybe there is something to this sport of duck hunting that a lot of us are missing.

However, Prime Minister James Callaghan said that the use of controls would be discussed and that appropriate action to revive the pound would be taken.

Life on Mars

A new soil sample in Viking 2's laboratory may give scientists almost certain proof of life on Mars. The soil analysis is needed to verify previous tests which have shown biological activity. The results will be relayed directly to the Jet Propulsion Lab and scientists could quickly tell if there is any organic material.

In order to be tested, the soil sample is heated and readings taken of the gases given off. Earlier, a similar test by Viking failed to reveal organic compounds.

Rhodesia

The leaders of five black African nations, rejected parts of the transfer proposal and demanded immediate transfer of power to blacks. Their main objection is that acceptance of the plan "would be tantamount to legalizing the colonialist and racist structures of power".

President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania said there would be no step down of guerilla activity until the transfer of power to the blacks is completed. This appeared to be the consensus of the other leaders who include the leaders of Zambia, Angola, Mozambique, and Botswana.

The five leaders met in a two-day conference and called on Britain to convene a conference to work in the establishment of an immediate black transitional government, and arrange for a full constitutional conference.

Sources feel that this doesn't completely reject the proposal, as both sides agree on majority rule and interim government. Sources indicated that there is a mood of reserved optimism that both sides would be able to iron out their differences.

Damascus Tragedy

A Palestine guerrilla group was blasted from a luxury hotel in Damascus after a three hour battle. During the fight, one terrorist, and four hostages died, and 34 hostages were wounded.

The hotel operation was seen as a reaction to Syria's backing of the right-wing Christians bent on crushing the guerrilla movement in Lebanon. The commandos called themselves the Black June group in reference to this.

It was unclear whether the hostages were killed in the fighting. A government statement said: "the commandos killed four hostages, including three women, and wounded 34 others."

The four commandos were reported to be members of the Palestinian guerrilla group Al Fatah. However, the group denied any of its members were responsible for the action. Informed sources identified the dead leader as Abou Hashish, a Palestinian, and the deputy leader as an Iraqi named Jabban Darwish.

The three surviving terrorists were hanged in Damascus 24 hours after their capture.

Driving Curfew

The Traffic Research Foundation of Canada proposes banning young drivers from highways between 9pm and 5am. A research report, released Monday, says that a restricted licence for drivers aged 16 to 19 along with better driver education would reduce highway accidents among this age group.

According to an earlier report by the foundation, impaired drivers aged 16 and 17 are 163 times more likely to be killed than the average motorist. The restricted licences would allow such young inexperienced drivers to gain their experience during the "low risk times" of 5am to 9pm.

Election

Next week Mayor George Speal will probably announce whether he intends to run in this year's election for mayor. He has already served two terms.

Alderman Keyes is thought to be a strong candidate for the position. He is an elementary school principal and would have to have an arrangement with the Frontenac County Board of Education to enable him to take time off from his present duties to cope with the job of mayor.

Mayor Speal believes in leadership by experienced people. Since Ald. Keyes has experience, Mayor Speal might not run if Ald. Keyes assures his candidature. If Mayor Speal does run, Ald. Keyes is not considered likely to oppose him.

Other possible candidates are Ald. Keenleyside, Ald. Gerretsen, Ald. Webb, and Ald. Timmins. Although a lot depends on Mayor Speal's decision to run or not to, this election is expected to be a hot contest.

Rent Hikes

A trial program at Kingston General Hospital is going to be started this week. Its aim is to help patients communicate with the staff and administrators.

For a trial period of three months a volunteer "patient receptionist" will be stationed in the medical wards. As each patient arrives he or she will be welcomed by the volunteer who will answer any of their non-medical questions and will refer any others to the doctor or staff member concerned.

Four volunteers have already been chosen and are undergoing training for the job. Dr. A.J. MacLachlan, director of the Kingston Institute of Pastoral Care, acts as a consultant for these volunteers. Helen Wright, a graduate of the University of Toronto hospital administration program, is co-ordinating this project in its trial period.

Such programs have already been set up at other Ontario hospitals, but not using volunteers. The object is to fill any gaps resulting from staff being too busy to spend personal time with patients or from patients being too intimidated to ask questions.

The Ontario rent review board has approved an average rent increase of 15.96 percent for the Kingston region. The provincial government had set a limit of eight percent but the board felt the large raise was justified.

The average monthly rent paid by tenants here has been raised to $215.53. The almost complete lack of available rental units in downtown Kingston, plus the very large number of buyers looking for houses near the Queen's campus for speculation purposes, are cited as reasons for the big increase in rent. The higher costs to landlords of renting houses by the year to students, as against renting houses over extended periods to families, is also a reason to give landlords more rent.

Apparently the rent control program is working successfully here; less than ten percent of local landlords have asked for rent increases over eight percent.

Quick Looks

During frosh week one hundred and five dollars worth of beer mugs (or 150 steins) were swiped from the Queen's pub.

Two boys got their fingers caught in the holes of a special custommade steering wheel of a car parked in a Pickering garage. They spent the night in the car before their screams for help were heard. Firemen cut the wheel loose and freed the young men from the trap.

A West German widow could not decide whom to give her money to. After remarking her will countless times, she finally died, leaving all her savings and her home to her postman.

About twenty-five American ham radio operators are watching pictures from Mars in their own homes. About one third of a total of 260,000 qualified hams in the United States have the capability of receiving photos transmitted by the Viking lander on Mars, 230 million miles away.

A new association is being set up in Kingston, the Kingston Criminology and Corrections Association. The ordinary public will now have a chance to propose changes, set up projects, do counselling work, and conduct studies in a field they ordinarily only hear about, that of prisons, law courts and police. To be truly effective, this group hopes to attract a wide variety of people from diverse backgrounds. Community concern and action are one of the best ways to reduce the causes of crime, and this group plans to become actively involved in the field of social justice.

With the Thanksgiving holiday this Monday, there will be only one edition of The Queen's Journal next week. This will be on Thursday, October 14. The advertising deadline for this issue will be 12 noon this Thursday, October 7. Press night will be next Wednesday, October 13.

Literacy report draws criticism for use of finals

by Trish Crowe

Reactions to Prof. Colin Norman's claim that 37 percent of first year students write badly and 34 percent are only 'potentially literate' have been surprisingly similar. The blame for this low standard has been placed on the universities, high schools, primary schools, the family and governments.

The universities are being told to establish remedial courses for the illiterate students they receive from the high schools. The high schools, influenced by student pressure to adopt a less rigid and formal course of English study, are blaming primary schools for not instructing children in basic grammar. Primary schools do not feel they have the responsibility to give more than an introduction to the rules of English grammar and composition. Emphasis is also being placed on the family and the importance of teaching good English to children from the earliest age. The governments are being advised to allocate more funds toward all these educational establishments.

One of the most widely voiced criticisms of the report is with regard to the methods used to determine final examination papers of first year students in English, Geology and Sociology in order that he might indicate literacy trends of first-year students in the humanities, the Natural Sciences and the Social Sciences. The desire for a more comprehensive study, comprising evidence of writing ability of students from more departments, has been expressed, in order that a wider

Mr. Donald Hall, principal of Kingston Collegiate & Vocational Institute, felt that the Norman report being the first of its kind in this region, will provide a good basis for comparison for the future. He explained the problem faced by high school teachers today that of competition with television as a comparison with information made available to students through television, teaching facilities are sadly lacking. But despite this problem, Hall feels students are graduating with a competent knowledge of the basic rules of English grammar and composition.

The report has been praised for raising the question of the high school in today's society. Hall pointed out that the number of people graduating from high schools has almost doubled within the past decade. He also stressed the importance of the fact that these graduates are being trained not just for university, but for various social and technical fields.

There is disagreement, as to whether or not this problem is a highly significant one. It could merely be an indication that the means of thought transmission and communication are changing to a more universal pattern, one result of an increasingly science-oriented world.

The report has been successful in achieving its basic purpose of encouraging "informed and lively debate within the academic community at Queen's".

Ex-cadets celebrate 100 years

The Royal Military College welcomed ex-cadets from Canada and overseas this past weekend to celebrate the annual Reunion with an extraordinary flourish in this, its Centennial year.

The programme of events which began on Thursday evening saw its most memorable moments on Saturday morning with the ceremonial parade and presentation of awards on the RMC Square. The British Army honored RMC with the special presentation of a commemorative painting.

That afternoon RMC met Seneca College in a football game won by the visitors. This was followed by an evening dinner-dance held at the College. The reunion concluded Sunday morning at the Memorial Arch where the traditional service was conducted following the Church parade.

The Queen's Journal notes the camaraderie of the RMC graduates and extends its congratulations.

He changed curriculum, now says TV's the culprit

In a speech to student teachers at McArthur College of Education Wednesday, Dr. Lloyd A. Dennis, co-author of the 1968 Hall-Dennis report urged that writing skills of modern students should not be judged by standards that existed 20 years ago.

Television viewing has resulted in students having highly developed verbal skills but lacking in writing capabilities, according to the director of education for Leeds and Grenville County. "The fact is that parents have less time to spend with their children. They all sit down and watch television," said Dr. Dennis.

The Hall-Dennis Report, which is responsible for many of the changes in the Ontario education system during these past years, stressed that dreary spelling and grammar drills should receive less emphasis. Dr. Dennis stated that he saw no reason to return to a curriculum which stresses the basics of reading, writing and arithmetic.

The liberalized school curriculum of today is excellent, he said, because it allows students freedom in pursuing their own goals and it offers more opportunities for creative growth to more individuals.

He urged student teachers to take a humanitarian approach toward students and foster true learning situations within a "mature educational system".

Western's OFS withdrawal

Later this month the continued participation by the University of Western Ontario in the Ontario Federation of Students will be decided in a campus wide referendum. This vote, of great significance to the future welfare of the OFS, is therefore important to all students.

Western's lack of commitment to the OFS reflects its general disenchantment with the Federation as the representative voice of the students of Ontario. Such an attitude, owing to OFS leftist tendencies, is in no sense unique to the students at Western. Yet it does not warrant the serious action of withdrawal from OFS, a move which would detract substantially from that body's stature by undermining its claim to represent the views of the students of Ontario.

Students are an interest group whose views on certain issues ought to prevail upon government thinking. A unified voice is needed.

The OFS has arguably performed less than outstandingly in representing students. In the past it has been given to frequent displays of rhetoric concerning the present nature of our society and its value system. This has given rise to concerns on a wide range of issues with which the OFS was not in many cases, designed to deal. It is this ideological aspect, representative of the views of few of its members, which has done little to establish OFS credibility in government circles.

More sensible elements in the OFS have always held that for the Federation to be successful, its goals must be essentially pragmatic and within the realm of possible achievement. It must be conceded that such goals do not include continually fighting the system. Rather they are based on the working premise of tolerance for the present social, political, and economic systems within which we live.

Over the past year OFS has been gradually moving towards this more pragmatic conception of its role. Resolutions at recent conferences have indicated an inclination on the part of delegates to concern themselves with the more concrete issues confronting them such as student summer unemployment, OSAP, and student housing.

This change in focus can in part be attributed to a conscious effort on the part of Jamie Avis' administration to provide a strong input into OFS. Queen's attitude toward the OFS has in the past been largely ambivalent, although most Executives have recognized the need for such a body as the OFS and, as in the case of last year, have often been active participants in the formulation of OFS policy. This discomfort has arisen from the obvious discrepancy between the prevailing philosophies of OFS leaders and the majority of Queen's students.

The option open to any AMS Executive anxious to fairly represent this University to OFS would be to withdraw from that body, or to attempt to influence OFS policy.

The Journal maintains the latter course of action to be the most profitable, although it does require the expenditure of considerable time and effort. Nonetheless, as Jamie Avis would testify, such a policy has produced results. We would urge the University of Western Ontario not to ignore the progress which has been made. Let them support Mr. Avis and Co.'s positive move and help contribute towards a more responsible and viable interest group.

Chevron's closure wrong

The closure of the Waterloo Chevron by Waterloo's Student Federation president Shane Roberts was a grim overreaction. The possibility of dominance within the paper by members of the Anti-Imperialist Alliance was hardly sufficient cause to shut down the Chevron.

About an hour after the editor, Adrian Rodway resigned Roberts made the decision to close the paper. His move was intended to preclude any possibility that Chevron staff members affiliated with the AIA would take control of the policies of the paper despite the fact that AIA members did not dominate prior to Rodway's resignation. They did however influence to a certain extent Chevron policies. There were too many other staff members for AIA domination.

Regardless of one's political stripe, student's should be free to participate in the campus press. No group of students should be free to use a student paper to propagate its party's platform but this has been proven not to be the case.

Roberts attempted to protect his campus paper from the influence AIA propagandists. His decision to suspend the Chevron's operation for four weeks though was hastily made and amounts to a serious affront to the freedom of the press.

Built for $75,000 in '02

Ont. Hall needs $800,000 facelift

by Debora Sigler

Ontario Hall is in the process of getting a face lift. Phase I of construction is just about finished, and Phase II should be getting under way, pending funding from the Ontario government.

The building was erected in 1902 by the Ontario government and from here came its name, Ontario Hall. According to professor Dupre of the Art Dept. the design of the building derives from University College at U of T. He feels it is the best example on Campus of the Romanesque revival style popular at the beginning of the century. It was considered by the Ont. government an important example of this particular style.

The 1902 price tag was $75,000. Today, approximately $800,000 is needed to finish the reconstruction. The building is so solid that it would cost several million to build from scratch. Phase II of construction again depends on funds from the Ontario government, and the Dept. of Art is trying to convince the Ont. government to continue the funding.

Phase I consists of the southern half of the building, except for the top floor. Phase II consists of the northern half, and the fourth floor. The Art History library is just about complete, under Phase I. It looks very medieval, with its hammer beam ceiling, and the old wooden tables from Wallace Hall.

Ontario Hall is the new home of the Art Dept. which Professor Dupre says was "a Little Orphan Annie". As well, a theatre for the Dept. of Film Studies should be completed soon.

Hopefully, the Dept. of Art will be able to convince the provincial government that the reconstruction of Ontario Hall is indeed a worthwhile project. Maybe they will be able to see their way to fund their namesake on the Queen's Campus.

We all sponsor four children

Mary Anne Tateishi
When Gord Taylor first took over the job of managing the Foster Children's Plan at Queen's, he was greeted by "a set of discouraging circumstances," according to Hugh Christie, External Affairs Commissioner. Mr. Christie was pleased that Mr. Taylor had volunteered to man the project not only because he thought the theology representative on Outer Council appropriate for the job, but also because the AMS has been fairly lax in recent years in promoting the project. Mr. Taylor has found the task "frustrating". There is a file full of information on the foster children yet no one has been writing to them, although their letters arrive at the AMS Office regularly.

Queen's sponsors four children namely Edouard Anouald and Carmen Escalante of Ecuador, and Magaly Arce and Edo Kristanto of Bolivia. The project is co-ordinated through the Foster Parents Plan of Canada in Toronto, where the letters are translated and then sent to Queen's. The AMS sponsors this programme and any extras as well, for example, the upcoming Christmas presents. The cost is only nineteen dollars monthly, per child, and does not come directly from student fees.

But now the programme is becoming more organized. Gord has found four people who want to write to the foster children but he needs even more. Gord hopes to involve lots of people in a project which he feels could become very satisfying. He wishes to see more publicity and interest for the foster children. If you would like to help, Gord Taylor will welcome your calls at 544-7966. Ideas for Christmas presents would also be most useful.

In memoriam

On Friday, August 27, Christopher Petrie (Arts and Science '77) of Ottawa was accidentally killed in a small Dutch town while riding his bicycle.

A memorial service will be held in Morgan Memorial Chapel (old Arts building) at 12:30 p.m., Tuesday, October 5. Padre Lavery, Principal Watts and the President of the Alma Mater Society will officiate and members of the Petrie family will be in attendance.

McArthur reps:

Voters choice in record turnout

Anne Johnson

In a display of participation rarely seen at McArthur, the student society elections were held on Friday, September 29. Results are as follows:

President, Peter Elliott, Vice Presidents, Internal Paul Torciera, External Halina Zilber (both acclaimed), Treasurer Debbie Hutton, Secretary Francis Shillings (acclaimed), AMS Representative Lane Corkal, Senator Joe Hatz (acclaimed).

This year, out of the close to 900 students attending McArthur, 27.4 percent voted - a full 10 percent above the expected voter turnout.

According to Paul Torciera, the interest shown in running for student society positions was far above past years when mostly all positions were acclaimed. This year, there were four students running for president, two for treasurer, and two for AMS Rep. The other positions were acclaimed. Said Torciera, "It is difficult on a year to get things going from scratch for the B.Ed. degree is only one year in length, and therefore there is no continuum in the student society."

There is as well, a time limit before which elections must be held, after mid-October most students are away from Kingston engaged in student teaching, and all are extremely busy. As well, there is much pressure to get the elections over with quickly and to appoint various representatives, to their posts. "Next year," said newly elected president Peter Elliott, "I plan to arrange things so that election procedures and time limits are better explained, and the short period of time allotted for the election can be utilized a little better."

Torciera, who ran on a slate with Elliott and Zilber, feels that part of their success was due to the fact that they spent time preparing flyers or information on who they were and what they intended to do.

They will continue to work with the McArthur faculty to maintain the rapport which the students find important during the one year they remain here. As well, Elliott feels that some form of orientation for the education students should be organized. He suggested that a pub be held early in September so that the students could meet each other as well as tours of main campus and Kingston, and an explanation of the library facilities. "This year there was absolutely nothing," complained Elliott, who is formerly from Guelph University. Elliott also hopes to set up a stationary store in McArthur Hall to serve the "west end" students.

Canada campus notes

Waterloo - now closed for four weeks:

Chevron situation worsens

WATERLOO [CUP]—Late Thursday night the Student's Federation at the University of Waterloo closed down the student paper, the Chevron, for a month and dismissed the production manager Neil Docherty and Henry Hess, the news editor.

The majority of the staff have lined up behind Docherty and Hess and will continue to produce the Chevron for the students without Federation support. The staff of the Chevron are ironing out the financial and administrative problems of keeping the paper alive.

The Federation's actions were sparked by the resignation of the Chevron's editor, Adrian Rodway, a week and a half ago. The Federation Executive took action at that time to close the paper because of rumor that the paper had been taken over by a left-wing political group known as the Anti-Imperialist Alliance (A.I.A.).

In a Federation meeting two days after Rodway's resignation the council voted to reopen the Chevron. The Chevron staff produced a special edition outlining the events surrounding the closing and were well into production of their regular Friday edition when they were informed by the executive that the Federation would not pay for any editions of the paper put out by that staff. In short, the Federation unlocked the offices thereby ending the staffer's occupation of the offices and "opening" the paper, but refused to pay the cost of printing it - effectively closing the paper.

Late last Thursday the Federation made it all official when they shut down the paper and fined the two remaining senior staff members. The Federation set up a committee to formulate a new structure for the paper. At no time during the entire affair had the Federation been able to demonstrate that the paper was being taken over by the A.I.A. or that the paper was unresponsive to student's interests. They have also failed to prove that Docherty or Hess were incompetent or remiss in their jobs.

Both sides are taking hard positions. The council is demanding an end to the alleged A.I.A. domination of the paper. The Chevron staffers are demanding their rights to freedom of the press and non-interference from student politicians.

The Canadian University Press (C.U.P.), the National Co-operative association of university and college newspapers will be sending an investigative commission to Waterloo. C.U.P.'s concern is that freedom of the press be maintained and that certain principals such as staff democracy are upheld.

McGill- Trustee's new rule:

Clubs must break even

MONTREAL [CUP]—Student clubs and societies at McGill University are being urged and threatened to become, "break-even propositions", by newly appointed Student Affairs Trustee G. Sam Kingdon and acting comptroller Sadi Hempey.

The trustee was appointed two weeks ago after one of two student committees carrying out McGill's suspended Student's Society duties decided to disband and set up distribution of essential club and building operation funds.

Kingdon expressed interest in having the campus paper, the McGill Daily operate on a break-even basis. The newspaper now covers two thirds of its costs with advertising revenues. The McGill Student Society was suspended last March due to serious financial and managerial problems.

Laval- striking profs and admin

Talks resume in Quebec

QUEBEC CITY [CUP]—Talks have resumed between striking Laval University faculty and the administration as a dispute affecting 23,000 students enters its third week.

Negotiations broke off after the 802 professors went on strike September 7, stopping registration and classes. The walk out followed an 83 per cent vote against the university's latest contract offer.

The faculty are negotiating their first contract in a year. Issues still in contention are salaries, job security, implementation of a faculty salary structure, participation in establishing teaching criteria and creation of a grievance procedure.

Generally the attitude of students has been to sit and wait it out. Most out of town students returned home, leaving about 250 in the residences

Illiteracy: What's New?

Jamie Avis, AMS President

The clamour with which the public media have greeted Prof. Colin Norman's report, The Queen's English, must come as a surprise to anyone who is familiar with the attempts of today's university students to express themselves.

"What's new?", such people must be asking themselves, for Prof. Norman's study merely documents an appalling state of affairs that has been widely recognized on campuses for some time. The fact is that many students have little or no acquaintance with basic elements of grammar and style. Unless the universities enforce high standards of literacy among their graduates, however, the degree will lose its significance as the mark of an educated person. In our society to be literate and to be educated are virtually indistinguishable qualities.

The problem of basic facility in the use of language must be solved at the secondary school level, not in the universities. Secondary school programs must become more structured and more demanding; students must be expected to read and write far more than they do now.

It is surely time we stopped expecting students to learn language skills without instruction, as if this type of learning could be accomplished by the exercise of pure individual creativity.

Ideally, it should be possible for universities to rely on the secondary school process enough that applicants could be refused to meet a certain literacy standard. The adoption of literacy tests for admission purposes would be unfair at the present time, however, since students of great potential may have been under-actualized by an inadequate secondary school experience.

A more appropriate response would be the application of literacy tests in first year for the purpose of determining which students need remedial training in language usage. Combined with this should be a literacy test which every student, regardless of discipline, should be required to pass before being allowed to graduate. Of course, this proposal assumes that reliable tests exist. If such tests do not now exist, great effort should be put into developing them immediately.

Every professor should be prepared to mark essays and examinations on the basis of grammar and style as well as content. It is a dereliction of duty for a professor to give a high mark to a student who cannot express ideas coherently. A professor who fails to mark style as well as content in any discipline is liable to be suspected of not understanding the elements of style well enough to evaluate a student's use of them. Any professor of whom this suspicion proves correct ought not to be teaching.

For several years the trend in pedagogical thought seems to have been away from the teaching of basic language skills. Hopefully, the pendulum is swinging back in the opposite direction. If the swing can be stopped in the middle, before we return to the equally unproductive regime of rote learning, we may yet see future generations who are more literate than their ancestors.

Mud-wallowing?

Dear Editor,

Other than a few patronizing remarks and vague threats, what did Mr. Binks have to say in the September 24 issue of this paper? The only reason he gave for regretting Canadian money being lent to the South African government was that it was now a bad investment risk. Presumably, if the troubles at Soweto had never occurred, he would approve more Canadian support for a regime that has institutionalized prejudice by denying the black population its basic human rights. He states that "no corporation would have invested in South Africa if they had known that something like recent events was going to take place." Very good. The corporations abhor violence but they can stomach legislated injustice.

Call the people who condemn the Canadian involvement in South Africa idealists, or, better still, call them people who do not understand harsh economic realities. I prefer to label us as those for whom the search for the buck has not left devoid of any small semblance of morality.

Yes, Mr. Binks, the "capitalist pigs" do bring home the bacon; but must you insist that they wallow in the mud first?

Stephen O'Shea

Discontinuation of the Bus-it scheme is probably the most logical and financially feasible solution. That is, financially feasible for this 80 percent. What about the remaining 20 percent? Granted, some live in West Campus and could be placated with a shuttle bus service between the two campuses. But there are students who live in less central areas of Kingston who could not benefit from such a service. Married students, for example, living in the Van Order Drive complex, would be forced to pay approximately $78 per year (a $72.65 increase) in order to make it to classes.

One solution to this would be for these married students to move closer to campus, thus contributing to the already existing accommodation problem.

The Queen's campus has often been accused of being a community unto itself, increasingly detaching itself from the Kingston community. To let Bus-it die its natural death would only serve to make it more of a cloistered entity than it already is.

Trisha Crowe

merely the reflection of the capitalist attitude of operating to maximum efficiency, and should it fall short, it should be eliminated. You have totally ignored the public service that it provides to all Queen's students. Should the Queen's Journal ever require an increase in fees to continue its operation, and it can be shown that "most" students could not care less about the Journal, does it follow that the Journal would stop publishing?

Klaus Sipolins

Sorry, Slovaks

Dear Sir

In the Queen's Journal (24.9.76) in the Sports section, I read "between Dzurilla and Vachon, the Czech and Canadian goaltenders." The writer, who wrote this article appears to have very limited knowledge about geography, history and also sport, since Dzurilla is not a Czech goaltender but a Slovak goaltender (SLOVAN BRATISLAVIA - Bratislava is the capital of Slovakia and Dzurilla is a Slovak as is Hlinka, Martinec, and Stastny Marian, Bohuslav and Peter are). In Canada, he played for CZECHOSLOVAKIA and not for the Czechs. CZECHOSLOVAKIA is a country where Czechs and Slovaks live. This lack of knowledge I consider very serious for a University journal. I would appreciate a correction in a future issue not for my satisfaction only but also for educational purposes.

General Strike

Dear Editor

I agree with H. Smith when he said (Journal Sept. 28) that wage and price controls are ineffectual and unmanageable. The controls placed on the Canadian government hold it back while doing nothing about wages while doing nothing about about prices and profits. Most students on campus have themselves experienced, read about or even seen evidence of the hardships incurred by the biased imposition of these restrictions. Many of us would like to see an end to this situation and by supporting the National Day of Protest we would show our opposition to the government that has imposed these controls without caring about their consequences. By showing that we feel that the controls are not effective for the purpose claimed we would not be performing an illegal act.

How can Jamie Avis suggest that this is not an important enough issue to warrant our action? Who are the people, whom he says are the majority of Queen's students who would not agree to go along with the National Union of Students in their support of the National Day of Protest?

Show your vote of non-confidence in Jamie Avis and his followers, and more importantly show your opposition to the wage-cuts of the Canadian government. Join me and don't attend classes on October 14. I'm convinced that massive support for the Canadian Labor Congress on the National Day of Protest is now the only way to ensure fair legislation from the government.

NDP column

by John Campey

by John Campey

The Queen's NDP has voted to support the October 14 Day of Protest by the Canadian Labour Congress.

At a meeting last Thursday,
Queen's New Democrats held a wide-ranging discussion on the topics of controls, their implementation and the justification for the Day of Protest. They then adopted a resolution providing for support in principle of the Day of Protest, and co-operation with other on-campus groups which are participating in the Day of Protest.

While there was almost unanimous agreement on the need for some form of controls, there was also a consensus that the inequities of the present program are so great as to more than offset any benefits.

While wages have been held to a maximum increase of 8 to 12 percent over the last year, the profits of the Chartered Banks in Canada have risen by over 40 percent to well over a billion dollars. Government spending is exempt from the controls, as are other key costs such as public transportation, energy and insurance.

To conclude this week's column, here is a classic illustration of how the Anti-Inflation Board works when dealing with company profits rather than working people's wages. It is taken from a statement by Donald C.
MacDonald, NDP Food and Agriculture Critic in the Ontario political page 7

Legislature

"In contrast to the continuous publicity focussed on the roll-backs in wages, whatever rollback in prices does take place is usually cloaked in secrecy, ostensibly to protect the competitive position of the company. Consider General Foods Ltd as an example.

"The AIB has discovered that General Foods had made an excess profit of $1.4 million on five of their fifteen product lines, so it ordered that prices be lowered and a refund made on the excess charge. This can be done by actually giving refunds, by reducing prices temporarily or by absorbing costs so as to hold the line on future price increases. How considerate that the company should be given all these options!

"But during the so-called compliance period, the AIB normally does not release the name of the company. In the instance of General Foods it was leaked by an indignant AIB official.

"This cloak of secrecy merely heightens public suspicion on an even more relevant point. How meaningful are the price rollbacks?

Again, consider the General Foods example. It is a standard practice for food manufacturers to give discounts on large purchases. Since the product lines on which excess profit were deliberately not revealed, how is the AIB to distinguish between normal discounts and rollbacks? Won't it be possible for General Foods simply to describe its normal discount as a price rollback, and continue charging the same amount?

"Or, does it mean that in some instances the food manufacturer may be giving supermarkets a double discount, one for bulk purchases and one for the rollback, all or a portion of which may not be passed on to the consumer?

"What guarantee is there that the consumer who was admittedly overcharged in the past is going to be compensated in the future? The answer, of course, is none!"

needs is general public support for Canadian control of the arts.

As one interested in the politics of culture, I hope that Communications Minister Sauve and the federal cabinet heed those interested in a genuine Canadian culture.

Now, to shift the topic to a provincial level.

Ontario politics has been the topic of opinion polls lately. Two separate surveys by the Liberals and Conservatives, reveal that if an election were held today, the Conservative minority would return to power.
However, support for the Conservatives is not necessarily support for Bill Davis, who is losing appeal as a leader while Stuart Smith and Stephen Lewis are gaining in that respect.

If, as the Globe and Mail concludes, Ontario voters do not want an election since it would not alter

the situation, then Liberal leader Smith has an unenviable task. He must support the government until an election will produce a definite change in Ontario politics. This appears to be what Ontario voters want.

Minority governments have a record of producing good legislation.
However, because the supporting party (here the Liberals) are not part of a formal coalition, they are not credited with this favourable legislation. A party in this situation also deters support for government legislation while trying to maintain a philosophy different from that of the government.

Though the Ontario Liberals are doing what the people of Ontario want, at election time people tend to forget that the Liberal MPP's are doing their best for Ontario.

PC column

by David Rayment

(OTTAWA) — In the analysis of Canadian elections the by-election is a curious species all its own. Some regard by-elections as accurate harbingers of the next election's outcome. This school of thought can point confidently to the dismal track record of the provincial Tories in by-elections between 1971 and 1975.

Others claim that the public does not approach a by-election as they would a full election, and results, therefore, can hardly be an accurate forecast of the future. Such political theory and punditry, along with many more specific questions, are swirling over the federal riding of Ottawa-Carleton as it braces itself for a by-election on October 18.

Ottawa-Carleton, barely a decade old, has had only one member John Turner. The reasons for his success are multiple, much of it lying with man's personality and the local Liberal machine. Old Tories in the riding often murmur that Ottawa-Carleton's a classic Gerrymander since it contains areas of traditional Liberal strength.

Yet the P.C. track record in the riding has not been too bad. In 1972 the P.C.'s made a very strong showing and in 1974 increased this, only to be swamped in the Liberal tidal wave.

In 1976, who knows? The riding has been without representation for a year as the Liberals hesitated to call an election. This time there is no
John Turner to spark the Liberal machine, and the federal government's popularity is extremely low.

The P.C. candidate is Jean Pigott, the owner of a local bakery and catering firm. She is opposed by Liberal Henri Rocque and NDP
Stephen Langdon.

Mrs. Pigott has been active in the federal party organization for years.
She was, however, so unknown to many people in the riding that the general thrust of her campaign has been personal contact with the voter.

This includes demonstrations in shopping centres, mainstreets (last week with Joe Clark), even talking to people waiting at bus stops.

This strategy seems to be working.
From "Jean Who?", Mrs. Pigott has, within weeks, become a power in the riding. Campaign organization? With a volunteer force of 15,000, the organization is obviously there.

This large force was augmented this past weekend when the two provincial youth associations, holding council meetings in the capital, canvassed the suburban Alta Vista area.

This region, in the centre of the riding, ranges from opulent homes to town houses, apartments and condominiums. It is in this east portion of the riding, where population concentrations are to be found. Here the election will be won or lost. On a Saturday afternoon this writer and thirty-seven young P.C.'s from outside the Ottawa area, canvassed for Jean Pigott.

The response was good. In the condominiums and apartments the Tories and the NDP held sway. In the more well-to-do areas the P.C.'s split with the Liberals, whose strength has been definitely weakened. Many who have voted Liberal in the past were now ready to support the Conservatives. Although the NDP are showing strength, the general consensus appears to negate any possibility of victory. This is not unlike working-class district, and the NDP have yet to rise out of third place.

The Conservatives smell victory, and the public appears to be in agreement. The Liberal candidate is virtually unknown, although his lawn signs litter the gardens of cabinet ministers. It looks like Ottawa-Carleton will be the first step in Joe Clark's long march to victory in 1978.

Civil Disobedience and Anti-Inflation Board

by John Higgins

When does the unjustness of a law justify civil disobedience? In attempting to answer this question there appear to be two separate areas of inquiry: how do we evaluate the justice or injustice of laws, and how unjust must a law be before we are prepared to object by means of civil disobedience?

Howard Smith apparently set out to grapple with these problems in his article, "When does law become unjust?" (Queen's Journal, Tuesday, September 28, p. 7.) The analysis presented in that article, however, indicates that, because Mr. Smith believes there is no way of knowing when the law is unjust, there can be no appropriate occasion for the exercise of civil disobedience. He tells us that if people refuse to obey laws upholding apartheid or the extermination of the Jews because they disagree with them, they might also refuse to stop at stop signs. Then he says that there is no consensus among human beings about what is just. His conclusion from these observations is that no one has any business objecting to any law whatsoever; not at least by disobeying it.

I heartily disagree with this analysis. If people had failed to express their disapproval of unjust laws simply because there were people who disagreed with their evaluation of such laws, or because the regular functioning of society might be interrupted, there would have been no French Revolution, no American Revolution and no Chinese Revolution. No one would have taken up arms against Adolf Hitler.

The fact is that human beings can morally evaluate laws and act on their opinions. The real questions are how to evaluate laws, and what action to take if the evaluation reveals injustice.

Mr. Smith suggests a yardstick for evaluating laws when he says that we must respond to the question, "is obedience to the law essential when its substance seems unjust?" by asking, "unjust to whom?" Unfortunately this question is left as a question in Mr. Smith's article. I would assert that if we ask "unjust to whom?", any unjust law will reveal an oppressed group of persons, and by implication, an oppressor.

In some instances where a group believes that it is being unjustly oppressed, the perceived oppressor believes that justice is on its side. If this is the case, any involved person will have to make a choice between the two available viewpoints. Such a choice can be made by asking whether one side or the other is in a position of power, and is using that power to infringe the rights of the other side.

It may be that in some cases this question cannot be answered. With regard to Canada's anti-inflation law, it appears that the federal government is using its power to repress the rights of Canadian workers, by operation of law.

The presence of the roles of oppressed and oppressor is obvious in laws upholding apartheid and racial extermination. The Blacks in South Africa and the Jews in Nazi Europe had done nothing to deserve the treatment which was imposed on them. They have been oppressed through the operation of unjust laws.

Having arrived at a method of evaluating the justness of laws, it is now necessary to ask when an unjust law becomes an appropriate subject for attack through civil disobedience. Here the question to ask is, how far have the affected people's rights been unjustifiably curtailed? In this country, so we are told, there exists a healthy respect for everyone's right to life, freedom, and dignity. The oppression of so many groups in our society - women, non-whites, gay women and men, the workers, the aged - tends to suggest that this supposed respect for rights is nothing but lip service. That is unfortunate, because such respect is a necessary ingredient in a decision about how far rights have been curtailed, and how serious the situation is.

Another factor to consider, when deciding whether a particular act of civil disobedience is justified, is the seriousness of the proposed breach of law. There must be some balance between the severity of the breach of rights and severity of the proposed breach of law.

In attempting to evaluate the Canadian anti-inflation law then, we must just look for injustice by asking "unjust to whom?" and looking for the roles of oppressed and oppressor. Then we must evaluate the seriousness of the breach of rights which is occurring, and attempt to respond with an appropriate form of protest.

Although it is apparent that the anti-inflation law does not breach human rights as severely as laws upholding genocide or apartheid, I would assert that when we ask "unjust to whom?", we can see that Canadian workers are oppressed, in the financial interest of their oppressors, the capitalist elite.

How serious is the breach of rights? The anti-inflation law is merely one aspect of worker oppression, the latter being a time-honoured tradition in Canada. The anti-inflation law merely upholds the status-quo. However, the oppression which is maintained by this law is, in my opinion, serious and far-reaching. Oppression is a very dangerous phenomenon, based as it is on prejudice or economics. It insults people. Very often when they perceive the insult, they fight. What person who believes in fundamental human rights can avoid supporting this fight?

The form of protest suggested for October 14 is not a severe breach of the law. My analysis of the situation indicated to me that the protest is justified. If anything, it is mild under the circumstances.

Howard Smith

In their article entitled "Myths and Social Justice: How Reality is Obscured," Bill Burgess and Ross Sutherland refer to Outer Council's "adherence to legalities" as "parliamentary cretinism" and a "sense of lemming subservience" to "THE LAW".

Such a result arises, so the authors argue, from a "social vacuum." The social vacuum they describe is the failure to recognize that in Canada we have a vastly unequal distribution of wealth. It is this "reality" Messrs. Burgess and Sutherland would contend warrants illegal action.

In another opinion, Leslie Montgomery, querying one's recourse when society's formal remedies are exhausted though an unjust law lives on, uses the example of abortion. She asserts, albeit without source, that "a majority of citizens believe the issue of abortion should be between a woman and her doctor." I should be grateful, Ms. Montgomery, if you might document this conclusion.

Ms. Montgomery also referred to the Morgentaler case, implying that his rendition of abortion services was warranted, he having been frustrated in a search for legal remedies. As to Dr. Morgentaler, did he really exhaust his legal avenues before resorting to making unilateral decisions to abort?

Section 251 of the criminal code makes abortion an offense, save when it is approved by a hospital committee. The committee does not, as Ms. Montgomery suggests make a decision "in their wisdom." Rather section 251 (c) of the Code gives them discretion to approve only when there is danger to the "life or health" of the mother. Many committees have interpreted "health" to mean mental and/or physical health. Thus these committees, believing any unwanted pregnancy to be a threat to the mental health of a mother, "rubber stamp" abortions. In most communities one can find committees who do, or do not subscribe to this reasoning. If the committee you intend to consult does not, you see another which does, enough do that the need is met. Abortion is thus a non-issue.

Notwithstanding the weak example Ms. Montgomery chose to illustrate her point, she poses a valid question when she asks what recourse do you have when you dislike the use of artillery, but a flyswatter has failed? The question begs a preliminary enquiry.

By way of an example, suppose a person believes the law regarding rape is unjust. Assume he petitions his local M.P., writes articles in the media, beseeches his party to oust the government through a vote of non-confidence and predictably does not succeed. His flyswatter has failed - does he then have a license to rape? Clearly not. Were it the case that a substantial majority of Canadians stood behind him, then perhaps the deaf ear of government would suggest the time for civil disobedience was nigh.

Thus we have come full circle. What is justice? Are wage and price controls injustice? Messrs. Burgess and Sutherland, being so personally beholden to "reality" of this injustice believe not merely trivial illegalities, but possibly outright rebellion will resolve this matter (can a general strike do it before artillery does?) So perhaps a general strike is indeed the "thin edge" of the anarchy wedge a general strike today - a general riot tomorrow.

Messrs. Burgess and Sutherland have, I respectfully submit, never yet gained sight of the issue. The issue here was and continues to be, do wage and price controls, if they are indeed an injustice, warrant unlawfulness? That Canada may have an unequal wage distribution, or whether or not Wage and Price Controls are in essence unjust is not an issue at this juncture. Anyone, irrespective of whether their personal banner smacks of a travesty of human dignity or vested personal interest, has recourse to government for change. If then change is not forthcoming, one enters the question of whether the law accords with "justice." If, the answer is, by a substantial majority, a resounding "no" civil disobedience is appropos.

Given a Canada united in the principle that Wage and Price Controls are a social injustice, given a legitimate and comprehensive resort to legal remedies to no avail, then Messrs. Burgess and Sutherland, I will resolutely join you in civil disobedience.

finds such offences morally unacceptable, and thus wishes to punish offenders.

However, since drunk driving is so common, it has almost become "morally acceptable behaviour", says Dr. Wilde. "The guy arrested becomes the involuntary martyr, and the natural psychological reaction by the drinking public is resentment."

The attitude of resentment is not conducive to the main purpose of the cause, namely rehabilitating the drinking driver.

enough, with a population larger than Kingston each year requiring medical attention due to car accidents in Ontario.

However, would the stricter laws bring about the desired effect, i.e. reducing traffic deaths and injuries? No so, according to Dr. Wilde.

Dr. Wilde has done several studies in the Kingston area on what should be done to provide safer highways. Overwhelmingly, the public opinion of these studies submits that drunk drivers should be heavily penalized. However, Dr. Wilde feels such penalties would be counter-productive.

Drunk driving is a very common phenomenon in Canada. After 10:00 p.m., it has been estimated that up to 15 percent of drivers are over the legal limit of .08 per cent blood alcohol concentration, states Dr. Wilde. According to recent figures, on the average a man could conceivably drive up to 16,000 miles while drunk before he is caught. With the detection chances so slim, people who are caught drinking and driving feel "unlucky", states Dr. Wilde.

Hugh Dodd

"The leading cause of death among people below 40 years of age in most Western countries is a road accident", according to Dr. G.J.S. Wilde, professor of psychology at Queen's University.

This fact strikes rather close to home for university students, as the other leading causes of death, namely, heart disease and cancer, generally do not strike until a relatively advanced age.

Considering that alcohol is involved in roughly half of all traffic fatalities in North America, concerned officials and governments are examining stricter laws regarding driving and drinking to reduce the carnage. The injury rate is scary a result, produced a general theory of accident causation. This theory, nicknamed "Wilde's Law of the Conservation of Misery", is striking in its implications. Basically, it states that the amount of accidents in a country reflects the number of accidents the country is willing to accept. "Tolerated risk", is the variable, according to Dr. Wilde. People, when confronted with a safe situation, such as an open highway, will take more risks, such as exceeding the speed limit. Conversely, when the situation becomes hazardous, as in the case of slippery pavement, people tend to be more cautious.

Further variables come into play, heightening the level of tolerated risk. For example, a college student, who is normally a safe driver, may be late picking up his girlfriend. Consequently, he will drive more recklessly in order to meet his date on time.

Dr. Wilde also described this phenomenon at a national level, using Sweden as an example. During the 1960's, drivers in Sweden changed the side of the highway on which they drove from left to right. Drivers, while becoming familiar with this new actuality, characteristically drove with more caution. As a result, there was an immediate 20 per cent drop in accidents. Much ballyhoo was made of the striking decrease, and everyone thought that the accident problem had been curtailed. However, the publicity about safer roads had a negative effect. Since the public thought it was driving on safer highways, caution was thrown to the wind. A year and a half after the change of sides, accident rates had returned to their previous level.

With this theory in mind, what does Dr. Wilde suggest to reduce the number of drinking drivers? "For the development of a truly effective system of countermeasures against alcohol-involved road accidents, it is necessary that better insight be obtained into the way the law may beneficially influence the offender and have a general preventative effect."

Dr. Wilde wanted to get an intellectual grip on the problem, and as

Dr. Wilde became involved in surveys of driving habits? During the 1960's, he joined the general academic movement towards greater relevance, thus snubbing the "ivory tower" approach toward academic problems. He became a member of a research group on road safety, which was and still is an important social problem. "I've found it one of the most exciting fields I've ever been involved in," states Dr. Wilde. He suggests that there are many variables of human behaviour and outside interference that contribute to the degree (or lack) of road safety.

The way our law system is set up now, severe penalties are reserved for only a few major offences, such as acts of violence. The public generally

Stan Rogers at the Scarecrow

A very classy and moving performance

by Davis Eagle

Stan Rogers was in town last weekend and lived up to all expectations as he treated his audience to three nights of his maritime charm. I saw him on both Thursday and Friday nights and noticed that many of the crowd were returnees to three nights of his maritime appeal let alone the number of people who signed up to get advance orders of his long-awaited album, Fogarty's Cove.

Rogers presented new material since his last visit to Scarecrow the best of which was "Giant", a song which may or may not have something to do with Doug MacArthur who was in the audience on Friday night. Rogers overall sound had changed since the last I saw of him due to the addition of David Woodhead who plays a considerably more far-ranging brand of bass than his predecessor Jim Ogilvie. Also playing a more experimental style was Stan's brother Garnet whose expertise on fiddle and flute seems to grow every time he touches them.

This broadening has resulted in some new arrangements to his older material, preventing it from fading with age and shedding new light on such songs as "Make And Break Harbour", a ballad about aging fishermen which is sure to become a classic. John Allan Cameron is thinking of recording it. Hundreds of folksies will soon be playing and replaying the album, feverishly copying down the words and establishing its place around the campfires of the nation.

The only thing that detracted from Rogers' performance was his guitar which, while possessing beautiful tone tended to go out of tune quickly. This wasted time which could have been filled with more music. He played some of my favourites like Robbie McNeil's "Angeline", a slightly jazzy tune about the leaving of Nova Scotia, and his own unabashed love song "Honey All I See Is You". I say lucky for him because if he hadn't I might have done something rash.

During the night Rogers' tunes ranged from Hank Williams' "I Can't Help It If I'm Still In Love With You" which was delightfully corny though professionally done, to Willie P. Bennett's soft musing "Music In Your Eyes", a song in which Garnet takes the vocal introduction to good effect. I'm certainly pleased that Stan Rogers is finally putting out an album. It's about time talent of this calibre is being recognized.

Don't miss Bim

Davis Eagle

A truly exceptional musician will be playing this coming Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights at Scarecrow coffeehouse. His name is Bim. Some may remember him from the song he had on the hit parade last spring entitled "Can't Catch Me"; others might know him from Peter Czowski's television show where he shared the spotlight with Leon Redbone and the world skateboarding champion; still others will recall his appearance at various music festivals and concerts this summer. If you are all or none of the above, this weekend presents an opportunity you shouldn't miss as it may be the last time he will be playing in a "club" situation; it could be the only time in your life that you'll see a star up close and in the flesh because in my opinion this kid could be the biggest thing in years. I base my belief on repeated listenings of his first album Kid Full of Dreams, and from having seen him a number of times over the past year. The crowd-reaction at every concert has been quite amazing in as much as he was either raved about or despised. This in itself is unusual as most performers are either merely liked or tolerated and are nothing to get excited about. At worst Bim provokes a reaction and bears watching closely. This weekend you'll get that chance.

Washington a treat despite small crowd

Paula Woolfson at Bitter Grounds

Davis Eagle

Bitter Grounds last Saturday night was the scene of one of the most unusual occurrences I've ever been witness to. Jackie Washington had finished his first set to what I thought was fairly warm audience approval, taken a short break, and returned to an almost empty house. I didn't and don't understand what happened, it wasn't as if Washington was bad, quite the reverse, and I thought that the applause at the end of each song was both heartfelt and enthusiastic. If anybody knows for sure what happened, keep it to yourself (I like to think about things like this at the laundromat).

The guest set featured Paula Woolfson, a first year student who played some original compositions but concentrated on Joni Mitchell with some success. It was too bad that she had a cold as she possesses a very fine voice, good breath control and excellent pitch. Unfortunately she seems to think of her guitar as a pitch pipe and nothing more as it added little to her music. She appeared rather nervous and hurried through her set consequently losing the meaning of the lyrics. I wouldn't mind seeing her again though.

Jackie Washington is not what you'd call a classic blues artist in the style of a John Lee Hooker or a Lightnin' Hopkins. He is a musician of the Fats Waller mould playing easy swing tunes in a very smooth, jazzy fashion. His songs ranged from tin-pat-alley ditties like "Where Did Robinson Crusoe Go With Friday On Saturday Night" which was the first song Al Jolson ever recorded back in 1916, to the Whiskey Howl version of "Caledonia" which he played on the piano. Washington displayed an informal attitude with the audience "lickin'" and talking between songs and keeping the mood on the light side. He didn't seem to be bothered by the audience's exodus and continued his almost nightclub style with such tunes as Cole Porter's "Miss Otis Regrets" and Count Basie's "Goin' To Chicago Blues" and playing his very mellow guitar breaks which consisted of some of the most amazing chord progressions I've ever heard. One of the nicest breaks was in Fats Waller's "Honeysuckle Rose" where he matched some super-sweet licks with a scat version of the main melody. I hope that the next time Jackie Washington plays in Kingston he gets a full-time audience because he's worth it.

Tom Kneebone and Dinah Christie at the Grand

by Tony Pepper

"Strange, isn't it, how potent cheap music is?", said Dinah Christie. There is something irresistible about the team of Dinah Christie and Tom Kneebone. Whether it be their swinging, which is as distinctive as Rex Harrison's non-singing singing, or their clownishly broad, but highly personal style of acting, the partnership of Kneebone and Christie is undoubtedly one of Canada's most popular cabaret acts.

A Salute to Broadway Composers one performance only at the Grand Theatre was successfully formulated along the lines of Kneebone's previous shows, such as Colecutle, Oh Coward! and Gilbert and Sullivan. Tonight. The first half of last Friday night's performance consisted of most promiscuous gathering of Broadway musical numbers, composed by various writers, including Rodgers and Hart, Jules Styne, Peter Alle, Jerry Herman and Stephan Sondheim. Despite the reputation of some, the numbers offered were all quite obscure (have you ever heard of the musical Prettybelle?). Furthermore, very few of the offerings could have been termed "hits". They were all very soapy or very brassy. One had a feeling one was being treated last Friday night to a selection of the greatest hits of musical kitsch.

Kneebone and Christie mercilessly exploited the potential humor and sentiment of their material. Their gross, over-inflated interpretations, combined with the more than occasional interjection of some comic snatch or pathetic remash emphasized the "cheap" but "potent" nature of the music.

The closing number of the half, however, may be seen as the exception. The subtle irony derived from Sondheim's "Send in the Clowns" (from the musical A Little Night Music) added a certain poignancy ("Isn't it rich? Isn't it queer? Losing my timing so late in my career?") to all that had come before. The song in short, sinisterly shadowed the profession of the performer.

The second half of "A Salute" was composed of a medley of Noel Coward and Cole Porter tunes, such as "KA Bar on the Piccola", "Marina", and "Anything Goes." The tunes were interwoven with bits and starts of biographies and anecdote, and as the material was more familiar, I think more favorably received.

Considering the works of both Coward and Porter have been performed by Kneebone and Christie in Stratford all summer, and before that in Toronto at the Nell Theatre, neither the material nor the actors showed any sign of wearing thin or drying up. All the numbers and skits were presented with a good deal of energy and enthusiasm. It is hard not to like Tom Kneebone and Dinah

Christie. They display a rare breed of professionalism which is a composite of Vaudeville and festival theatre.

I make only two comments in passing, which are not to be taken as criticisms but as suggestions. I feel the evening would have been a greater success if it had been staged in a more intimate atmosphere. The charms of immediacy and impromptu are lost in the expanse of "The Grand Old Lady". My second comment concerns the state of the broadcasting system. If it is at all possible the theatre should invest in some new speakers. The distortions made the singing quite inaudible at times.

If you have a chance, catch Kneebone and Christie's act in Toronto, or when they next appear in Kingston. It may well be worth your while.

Dan Hill concert

The songs kept flowing strong and easy

by Sandy Graham

I'm convinced! In his Grant Hall concerts last Saturday night Dan Hill showed us who he really is. Just as I hoped he would, he took the stage alone (battered guitar in hand) and sat down quietly on a plain wooden chair. From the opening chords I knew this would be a warm and sincere performance. The next ninety minutes proved me right. Dan Hill poured forth his soul in a manner I never suspected he was capable of, and left no doubt in my mind or anyone else's that he is a sincere artist. After all, I'm not a stone wall...

Each set was divided into two more or less equal portions with a fifteen minute break between them. The result was two mini-concerts per set, each a fine blend of old and new songs with its own themes and climax. Accordingly, the music never lost its excitement and Hill, never faltering, performed with interest and energy to the very end.

Stripped of background strings, over-tracking and other such studio deception, Hill revealed himself as an open singer not the least bit reluctant to throw out his fears and worries to his audience. He wastes no time in fancy analogies, games, or as he puts it, devices to "spare us the pain of rejection". When he sang, "You say you're free", his voice was bitter and he sounded hurt: "You say you're free-well your freedom's killing me-and I feel just like a statue to be admired from a distance-my love collides with your resistance-then bounces back inside of me-the pattern goes on endlessly." At the same time though one could sense his fear of hurting "her". Hill's ability to combine many confusing and conflicting emotions in a single song is impressive.

Particularly effective was his rendition of a song he had just written, about "what goes down" between an old man and a young boy. He kept a crumpled sheet of paper containing the lyrics on his knee throughout the piece. Anyone who has the guts to do something like that deserves my admiration.

The highlight of the evening was his opening to "I Dreamt I Saw Your Face Last Night". He sang alone, without his guitar to accompany him. The passion and suffering he conveyed in those few moments made it the most moving of anything I've ever heard Dan Hill do - was well received by the enraptured audience.

Hill also showed us his excellent sense of humour, which was evident when he spoke about those songs which he "based on imagination". His between-songs patter was spontaneous and lively and he wasn't afraid to tell a few anecdotes that didn't really have punch lines. He sounded like you or I trying to tell a joke, but he wasn't fearful of not being funny. I really feel at home with a singer who would change the nameplates over a bank of hotel telephones or confess to looking up a teacher's skirt.

Dan Hill is not the artist he is on record. It's too bad that many people's only impression of a singer is through his recordings. I must confess spending a little too much time close to the vinyl myself, which is not the only way to become acquainted with a musician. Everybody must get to see Dan Hill live, if only to see his plastic image

melt before their eyes. You won't be impressed with his guitar playing (his melodies are not as developed as they could be), but you will wonder at his poetry and warm presence. Hill is imphatic when he sings of his contempt for the star machinery. A song he wrote to answer his critics was a subtle mixture of humour and poison, and was extremely well

David Crosby and Graham Nash

Whistling down the wire is more of the same

by Bob Murphy

Crosby and Nash have never had the ability to catch fire in the way that their former counterparts, Stills and Young, always threaten to, and often succeed in doing. Still their joint efforts have always produced a pleasant mixture of folk and pop (tempered by Crosby's jazz inclinations), and are notable for their vocal embellishments if nothing else. David Crosby is a singer of great power and emotional breadth.

Graham Nash has a light clear voice which is instantly agreeable (and becomes even more so upon repeated listenings), and he has proven he can sing with more conviction than would once have been thought possible. Together they have a unique vocal style based on their ability to harmonize impulsively, without treading on each others' ground. (It is this looseness of structure that has separated them from, say, Seals and Croft, who also rely on rich harmonies.)

It is no surprise, then, that "Whistling Down the Wire" comprises the trademark vocal harmonies, excellent musicianship, and clean, uncluttered production that made their previous records so likeable. Yet for all their technical prowess, the duo seems to lack even an ounce of character. Sadly missing from "Whistling Down the Wire", is any breath of newness or humour which would have added some much-needed life. They're just so damned serious. The shroud of gravity they cast over the proceedings is too much for their mainly middle-level material to support.

Three tracks are bright enough to shine through, "Taken At All", a lovely, liting, slightly countryish tune is an obvious choice for a single. The angelic Crosby-Nash harmonies are showcased to their best, and most beautiful, advantage.

"Foolish Man" triumphs on the strength of Crosby's vocal - the most urgent and deeply-felt on the record. The stark arrangement, featuring some nifty Dave Lindley guitar, works well with it.

However, the closing track, "Out of the Darkness", is the album's only unqualified success. The reason is simple. The song is worthy of the careful, caressing production that it receives. It also contains the album's best hook line ("Be the light or love will fade away").

Yet, as well as "Out of the Darkness" works in its painstakingly structured surroundings, it serves only to point out how inappropriate the same treatment is to the album's other material.

For instance "Mutiny" would have fared much better had they attacked the song with a more reckless approach. The one they take is tame and sluggish. Nash's vocal is non-committal. "Mutiny" uses only half the guts Nash is capable of summoning up.

What "Whistling Down the Wire" smacks of is complacency. Crosby and Nash offer nothing new or surprising here. Worse, they have wiped the grooves clean of any traces of struggle that would have suggested a willingness to deliver anything different in the future.

Cross Country

Rinne leads the way

by G.B.

Sophomore Clause Rinne showed the way for the cross-country Gaels last Saturday, as they ran away with the York University Invitational Team title for the second year in a row. Rinne placed second to Paul Williams of Guelph in the race, finishing just seven seconds behind the winner, in a time of 32 minutes, 10 seconds over the six mile course. Queen's Team Captain Adam Shoemaker crossed the line a mere two seconds behind Rinne to capture third place.

As the team championship is decided on the basis of the first five finishers for each university, the performance of our next three runners was also very important. Mike Deguida ran a good race to clinch 11th place, and not far back were clustered Roger Wheate and Dale Friesen, in 14th and 15th positions respectively. Queen's other runners were Max Barr, who finished 18th, Paul Tinari who came across 21st and Dave Grant who placed 27th.

A total of 43 competitors took part in the race, which was run on a swift York campus course, under beautiful sunny skies. A smaller, three-mile long women's sections was run at the same time as the men's. Queen's sole runner, Beth Buckingham, managed a commendable 5th place finish. The Queen's cross-country team's busy schedule continues next Saturday, when they return to Toronto for the U. of T. Invitational meet.

WIC-ly News

by Carolyn Corrigan

Missing: WIC is missing two extremely important members. Anyone knowing the whereabouts of either Bonnie Lewis or Sue Dennis are hereby requested to phone this number, 547-5939. Arts '77 and Arts '78 are in dire need of any helpful information regarding the above-mentioned girls.

Most WIC teams have now been formed and placed on a schedule, so check the WIC bulletin board in the women's locker room to find out when your team plays. If, by some misfortune, you did not sign up for a team just check the board to find out when either your faculty or residence team is playing and show up for the game.

Remember, the events presently in progress are Badminton on Monday nights, Basketball on Tuesday nights, Field Hockey and Inner-Tube Waterpolo on Wednesday nights and Flag Football and Co-ed Volleyball on Thursday nights (and it is up to you to provide the guys for co-ed volleyball!).

Also keep in mind that we have another big WIC meeting on October 5 at 6:00 p.m. in Seminar A of the PHE building.

Queen's track team on the move

At the McMaster Invitational Track and Field Meet, this weekend, Queen's Track came up with many great performances. The most outstanding performance on the track came from Vic Gooding but for performances off the track, Tony Verhoeven (the big drip) won hands down. Gooding had two first place finishes in the 400 and 200 meter races. The respective times were 50.1 and 21.9 seconds, both close to Queen's records. Tony Verhoeven was just behind Vic in the 400 meters for a second place, and he also managed a second in the javelin and a fourth in the discus. Charlie Hitchen was third in the 400 meters. Duncan Card was first in the 100 meters with a time of 10.8 seconds. Tim Page was only a nose behind Card was also third in the 200 meters. Bob McCormack ran 1500 meters in 4:05.8, outranking the rest of the field, and finishing first. McCormack was also fourth in the 800 meters in a time of 1:57.2 and Walt Sepic was third with 1:59.6 seconds. Jim Morrison and Rick Forsyth were 2nd and 3rd in the 110 meter hurdles. Marc Macaulay was first in the 400 meter hurdles with a time of 55.1 seconds. Mark Watson placed 2nd in the pole vault. Mark Evans was another big winner with two 2nd's in the shot put and discus events. Peter Becke was 2nd in the triple jump, leaping 43'2 1/2" and was 4th in the long jump. The men's relay team of Brian Arthur, Page, Card and Gooding was 1st with a time of 42.9 seconds. Page and Gooding then joined Macaulay and Verhoeven for another first place in the 4x400 relay. They ran the race in 3:22.3 minutes.

In the women's division the Queen's girls did extremely well. Karen Rahn led the way with a first place finish in the discus, heaving the disc 34.72 meters for a Queen's record. Miss Rahn was also fourth in the shot put. Sue Sisson was 2nd in the discus, with a toss of 31.58 meters. On the track, Jan Pipe set two Queen's records in the 200 and 400.

"Piper" turned the 400 meters in 60.6 seconds finishing in 2nd spot. In the 200 meters, she completed the race in 4th spot, and with 26.7 seconds as a time. Lynn Souter was 6th in the 100 meters. Mary-Anne Drinkwater had two 5th place finishes in the 200 and 400. Jean Dietrich was 3rd in both the high jump and shotput. She was also 5th in the 100 meter hurdles. Ann MacMillan was 5th in the 1500 with Sue Plumber just behind in 6th. Lynn Andrews was 4th in the 800 and Lee Ann Poland was 6th in the same race. The women's sprint relay team of Laurin MacWilliam, Souter, Drinkwater and Pipe set another Queen's record, turning in a time of 51.8 seconds.

In spite of the wet and bloody struggle this weekend, the Queen's teams are looking forward to "The Waterloo Open" next week.

Water Polo

Swimmers need work

by Brian Clarke

"There's nothing wrong with the Queen's University Water Polo team that practice can't cure."

This belief of Queen's coach Simon Beitler was seemingly born out at an Ontario University Athletic Association water polo meet held at Queen's Saturday.

Competing against teams from York University, the University of Toronto, and the Royal Military College, Queen's only lost one of its three games and that went to the very competitive U. of T. Blues.

In an extremely hard-fought battle, Queen's lost 12-6 to Toronto. Queen's defeated RMC 11-8 and York 20-5 in its two other games.

Other tournament scores were Toronto 23-0 over York, RMC 6-4 against York and Toronto 16-6 over RMC.

"I think I have one of the strongest teams this year that I have ever had," said coach Beitler. "We had some trouble against Toronto but that was to be expected."

Captained by George Gross, a former member of Canada's Olympic and National water polo teams, the Blues provided extremely stiff competition for the Gaels.

Tied 2-2 at the end of the first quarter, Toronto took command of the game with four goals in the second period while Queen's was unable to score any in reply. Although Queen's did score evenly with Toronto in the third quarter, each team getting two goals, the Blues once again outscored the Gaels in the final quarter to win 12-6.

"We were making mistakes on defence, but I think we can work it out with practice," said Beitler.

Queen's scorers against Toronto were Bob Brisebois, Dave Ardell and Peter Trebuss with two goals each. Trebuss led all Queen's scorers in the tournament, getting a combined total of 13 goals. He scored five times against RMC and six in the match-up with York.

In Queen's victory over RMC, Dave Ardell and Mitch Dent scored three goals each. Playing against York, other scorers for Queen's were Dent and Ardell with three goals each, Brisebois and Greg Vanular with two apiece, and Chuck Leighton, Mike Fox, Richard Glew and Graeme Black with one each.

The weekend tournament was the first of the season for the teams in the OUAA Eastern Section, although Queen's took part in an exhibition tournament last weekend at McMaster University.

All teams are now working towards the OUAA finals which are to be held right at Queen's this year on November 27th. There are three more OUAA tournaments before then.

As coach Beitler looks ahead to the Gaels' next tournament, he says practice is the key. Considering that the Gaels had only practiced for a maximum of 14 days before Saturday's tournament, when Queen's meets Toronto next time the outcome could be different.

Eleven days from now, October 16th, the Gaels will play in the second OUAA sanctioned tournament of the season at York University.

Gaels defeat Ravens, 28 to 18

Big Gold Machine rolls to second win

by Tom Shand

In a twenty-four man effort, Queen's Golden Gaels virtually eliminated Carleton Ravens with a 28 to 18 victory at George Richardson Memorial Stadium on Saturday. Gaels moved into a second-place tie with the Bishops Gaitors who lost to Concordia in the topsy-turvy O-QJFC Eastern Division.

Gaels outplayed Carleton in every category as they held the Ravens' offence to 186 yards while accumulating 342 themselves.

The Gaels of 1976, in my opinion, are the best-balanced football team we've had in my four years here at Queen's. In each game there have been a number of individual standouts and no doubt Darrel Penner will not be the only member to receive all-star recognition this season.

However the most notable improvement is in the offensive line. This unheralded group of individuals have allowed the Gaels' backs to move the ball for some 1400 yards in three games. Veteran Doug Lowry centres the front block and provides inspiration and leadership for the Gaels' fine guards, Randy Edgeworth and Kevin Thompson. Peter Sops, a rookie at right tackle, has worked in well and on the other side is the highly respected Gael captain Moe St. Martin. Keith Taggart and Paul Shugart on the ends also act primarily as blockers although both are dependable targets for Latham.

The Gaels' running attack was awesome in the third quarter with Jim Duncan and Dave Marinucci running with tremendous authority through gaping holes. Gaels opened the second half with eight consecutive running plays which accumulated 56 yards later with Dave Marinucci slashing across into the end zone. Tom Pullen, ex-CFL'er commented that first-year Marinucci (82 yards on four carries) looked like the type of back the pro teams are looking for.

Jimmy Duncan was forced to sit out the fourth quarter with a sore back and 89 yards. "Dunc" commented after the game that "this just isn't my year." However, Jim will get more than his share of yards if he can stay healthy because the running game looks very strong. Even without Bob Vanderwater, who suffered an ankle injury in the first quarter, the Gaels picked up 221 yards on the ground.

Doug Latham only completed 3 of 12 pass attempts but made the most of two of them. The pair went to Bob O'Doherty who romped for 56 and 60 yards in the first half and in so doing scored once and also set up a Blaine Shore field-goal.

Jim D'Andrea continued his heroics in the defensive backfield with two more key interceptions. The first was the turning point in the game as Carleton was leading 8-3 late in the first half. The Ravens were threatening to score again until D'Andrea took advantage of the Raven miscue. Gaels went on to score on the Latham-O'Doherty connection which inspired the offense in the second half. D'Andrea's second pickoff lead directly to Jim Duncan's third quarter touchdown.

Larry Small and rookie middle-linebacker Ed Andrew also intercepted Raven passes. Carleton's only interception was by linebacker Black who ran 15 yards for six points with a Latham misfire.

Carleton's other touchdown came on a perfect 36-yard strike from Q B Lee to speedy wide-receiver Wood.

The Gaels move on to McGill next Saturday and should be solid favorites to win, despite their exhibition loss to the Redmen.

Notes: Jim D'Andrea is nicknamed "Disco" by teammates because his backfield has been in constant motion on the field and off. Terry Wright punted well in the absence of Ted Tyczka. Blaine Shore increased his point total to 40 with 2 field goals, 1 single and 3 converts. Gaels linebacking corps could be the best in the conference. Darrel "Monsterback" Penner played courageously. He could hardly walk for the pain but managed to perform at his usual level of excellence. Carleton quarterback Lee had his vision totally eclipsed several times by defensive tackle "ham hands" Dick Bakker.

Mail strike?

The second national postal strike in less than a year will begin this week unless a dispute between the federal government and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is settled, according to CUPW president Joe Davidson. The union claims that the government is violating the contract signed last December. It states that 120 days notice must be given before installation of automated equipment and adverse effects of the installation must be worked out with the union. Although notice is being given, the government is not consulting with the union before putting in the equipment.

The strike of the postal workers could take the form of a complete work stoppage or wildcat walkouts in different locations each day.

Palestine conference

Palestinian leaders met Thursday to decide whether to fight or negotiate after major setbacks suffered in a two-day Syrian offensive. The offensive drove the Palestinians out of a dozen towns in the mountains east of Beirut. After talks in the resort town of Aley while fighting was going just five miles away, Yasser Arafat and his lieutenants were reported moving their discussion to Beirut.

Lebanese sources said Syria was demanding a Palestinian withdrawal from the Beirut-Damascus highway. This highway may become the demarcation line between the Christian right and the Moslem left.

Prisoner strike

Solicitor-General Francis Fox denied that Ottawa gave in to prisoners in an agreement that ended British Columbia's penitentiary drama. Fox points to the fact that charges will be laid as evidence of the government's strong attitude.

Wayne Culbert, a 21 year old prison guard was held for 80 hours by some nine prisoners as some 200 prisoners rioted. In order to obtain his release, the government agreed on some "very, very minor things". However, David Vickers, deputy-general said there never was any agreement that charges would not be laid. He also confirmed that charges would be laid as soon as a Royal Canadian Mounted Police and crown prosecutor's investigation was completed.

The concessions that the prisoners received were that no prisoner is to be physically mistreated as a result of the rioting, removal of prisoners from the fast wing to other B.C. penitentiaries, RCMP to take over from prison guards until the transfer is completed, and anyone facing criminal charges will not have to face internal charges as well.

Ancient jawbone

A human jawbone, thought to be about 20,000 years old, was found this summer near the Old Crow River in the Yukon. Professor William Irving of the University of Toronto brought the bone, one of the oldest human remains found in North America, to a press conference on Friday. The actual age of the jawbone, belonging to a 25-30 year old adult, will be determined using a method of neutron activation of mineralization in the bone.

The bone was discovered by the archeology team of the Northern Yukon Research Program. The members of this research group are looking for information on man's early occupancy in North America. They are concentrating on an area of the arctic missed by the glaciers and have found several bone tools, among many other specimens.

Premiers conference

On Saturday the 10 provincial premiers ended a 2-day conference. A major issue was the bringing home of the Canadian constitution, and it was decided that they want more part in the process.

Premier Robert Bourassa of Quebec reported support from the other provinces on Quebec's demands for protection of the French language and culture before the British North American act comes to Canada. However, sources indicate that there is still disagreement on a formula for amending the constitution. Eight provinces had accepted a formula worked out at the Victoria constitutional conference in 1971. Alberta and B.C. continued to demand veto power for any single province over any proposed changes in the constitution.

Hydro increase

The Ontario Energy Board recommended a 30.3 per cent increase in Hydro's bulk rates on Friday. This rise in rates, to be effective Jan. 1, would probably result in a jump of 25 percent in household hydro bills. The Hydro board of directors is studying the OEB's recommendation and will decide by Oct. 12 whether or not to implement the rate increase.

The two opposition parties in the Ontario legislature complained that the rise was "absolutely extravagant" since the rate increase for the public corporation is larger than those allowed private industry under the Anti-inflation Guidelines.

French in air

Air Canada announced that following an order by the Quebec Superior court, it will allow the use of French in aircraft cockpits. The order was issued September 7 by the Superior court, and Air Canada's appeal was refused by the Quebec court of appeal. The company will still be required to abide by all other applicable laws and standards of safety.

73 Brock Street

A commercial gallery is opening this week at 73 Brock Street. Three Kingston women, all one-time volunteers in the art rental program at Agnes Etherington art centre, own and run this gallery. Works of Andre Bieler, Grant Macdonald and David Brown, all well-known Kingston artists, form part of the collection. Also represented are Kim Ondatje, Robert Peterson, Bob Blenderman, Mack Sloan and Chris Woods. The owners hope to offer works by artists from all across Canada in the future.

Illiteracy

Other Ontario universities than Queen's are facing the problem of illiteracy among students. Dr. Ledbetter, project co-ordinator for language testing at Waterloo, concluded from Dr. Norman's report that 70 per cent of first year students at Queen's have no right to be here. Waterloo, by comparison, has a fifty percent literacy rate among its first year students high enough to justify their presence at university. Carleton, Lakehead, York and Western all have established remedial English programs which students attend on a volunteer basis. Windsor University's President Dr. Leddy said that this report has not lowered his image of Queen's, but he would not tell reporters what he thought of the image to start with.

Fewer students

Educators have a true problem planning the enrolment in the schools of Frontenac County. The last results of the baby boom are the 770 more students in high school this year as over last year. But the elementary school enrolment has dropped by 606 students this year.

The Frontenac Lennox and Addington County Roman Catholic Separate School Board reports a drop of only nineteen pupils this fall. As a whole the schools downtown are suffering from a decrease in student numbers as more families move into newly-developed suburbs or into rural areas. There are only 83 students at Central Public School in downtown Kingston. But the school has a capacity of 284.

Renovations

New canopies have appeared over the doorways of the old Ontario bank on the corner of King and Clarence streets. Old Stone Properties Ltd., of Toronto now owns the building and is extensively renovating the first floor.

An insurance executive will move into the first floor shortly. The other three floors will be redone in the future. Old Stone Properties owns the professional building on the corner of Ontario and Princess and ten other buildings in Toronto, London, Quebec city, Port Hope and Owen Sound. All these buildings are heritage-type or designated as historical.

Loose ends

Judging by the correspondence columns of the London Times, the chief worry of Britains at the moment is whether to eat porridge sitting down or standing up. It is said that in the best Scottish houses porridge eating is peripatetic. When eating porridge standing up you can place your back against a wall to avoid being stabbed from the rear, you can walk about to keep warm, or, if necessity calls, in record time you can leap out of the window, jump onto your horse and charge off to a foray.

Lady Beaverbrook wanted so badly to have her two puppies travel with her in the cabin of an international jet flight between London England and Halifax that she chartered a 272-seat Air Canada jet for herself, her sister, and her two puppies. The cost - a mere $15,000.

A "super hog" slaughtered recently in Canada weighed 306 pounds, had hams weighing 25 pounds each, but had no more fat than a 200 pound hog would ordinarily have.

Bird speaks at Queen's her address before Queen's students Wednesday night, reformer Caroline Bird termed university, "A big warehouse full of people who don't know what to do with themselves."

Bird to university students:

"If you're a jerk now you'll be a jerk later"

"Appalled at the awful lack of direction" of university students, journalist and feminist, Caroline Bird has launched a violent attack on post-secondary education in North America. Her book, The Case Against College, attacks the entire setup of university as it now stands.

At a press conference, Ms Bird answered questions posed by Moe Chochla (AMS Education Commissioner) and Sue Bentley. She expressed her view that many universities were nothing more than "high rise buildings, filled with kids from 18 to 32," with nowhere to go. She has come to believe that "college is not what I thought." It is, she asserts, "not fun, not exciting," in short, "a big warehouse full of people who don't know what to do with themselves."

According to Ms Bird, the ideas she expresses are not hers but those of "the kids" with whom she has talked. They have told her that going to college is "better than clerking at the drug store" and that they are "better off here (in university) than on welfare."

"I honestly don't believe that half the university students would spend that kind of money on a liberal education" if they didn't think they were going to make money from it. She claims that you can't "inject a liberal arts education at age eighteen," but must start early in life. Indeed, a university education will probably make little change in a person. As Ms Bird has phrased it before: "If you were a jerk when you went to college, you'll probably still be a jerk when you get out." "We ought to take our money," she says, "and spend it on the third grade, since it is very elitist to fund a few through college and allow the rest to suffer."

"This society has not solved the problem of preparing people for adulthood" and we are pushing the time of entering this stage farther and farther back. By using university as a holding area we have fostered the notion that the only person who will be anybody has to go to university.

"Bright students are finding other things to do" after high school, and Ms Bird states that "if we're going to fund some people in university then we must realize the value of diversity and fund other things as well."

Profs asked for day's pay, students to miss classes

by Bernie Helling

Letters have been sent out to all Queen's professors asking them to cancel or reschedule October 14th classes in order that students might participate in the Canadian Labour Congress general strike. The student organizing committee for the general strike also called on professors to donate their day's pay to contribute to the costs of the protest.

The Wednesday night meeting of the Strike Committee confirmed that support activities were well under way. Planned action includes a poster and leaflet campaign; a number of information booths in MacCorry and MacArthur College; an informal discussion on wage and price controls and an ad in the Whig Standard.

All this is leading up to a rally on the day of the strike, which is scheduled to start in front of the library and then proceed to Confederation Park, where it will join the Kingston District Labour Council demonstration. According to the committee, there is also a strong possibility that pickets will be set up in front of building entrances to urge students to boycott their classes.

The informal discussion of wage and price controls will take place on October 12 and provisional panelists include committee member Lin Andrew, Economics professor Richard Lipsey and a representative of the K.L.C. Library workers voted on the question of the walkout on Tuesday night and appear to be in full support of the strike action. The Physical Plant workers' decision is still outstanding.

Queen's participation in the CLS's "day of protest" has been more clearly defined in the past few days. The students organizing the event are calling on professors to give up a day's pay and for classes to be cancelled. In the event that students aren't convinced that they should participate in the protest voluntarily, the group plans also to have a few people picketing in front of the Queen's buildings, "urging" students to boycott classes.

Will Queen's students be "scabs", a breed of person so colourfully described for us last month by the Ontario Union of Students' newspaper, The Student? "A scab," that paper said, "is a two-legged animal with a corkscrew soul, a waterlogged brain and a backbone of jelly and glue." Furthermore, "where others have hearts, he carries a tumor of rotten principles." Finally, "no man has a right to scab as long as there is a pool of water to drown his body in or a rope long enough to hang his body with."

What right have these students to "urge" others to miss classes? What part have Queen's students to play in the CLC protest? The federal government has legally imposed temporary controls on wages and prices in Canada. Students who feel that these measures are unjust are quite free to join local rally. Those who feel that the government has acted well within constitutional right to guide to a greater degree the nation's financial being in a time of economic uncertainty should ignore the day of protest. According to a recent poll, those who choose the latter course of action are joining 21 million fellow Canadian "scabs".

Ethics of journalism

This paper often becomes more than just a reporter of news and politics at times a very political body in its own right.

In its last edition, the Journal published a short editorial opposing closing down of the Chevron by the Waterloo Students' Federation. In the meantime the Canadian University Press has stepped in and told the Chevron staff to resume publication. Using CUP money, the first edition will appear in Waterloo as you read this.

This paper was asked to support the Chevron financially. We will support the Chevron or any newspaper produced by Chevron staff as long as the Waterloo Students' Federation decides that it will not give its full support. To support the Chevron financially or otherwise amounts not only to copyright violation but ethically leaves much to be desired.

The Journal offered an alternative suggestion that CUP produce a fair and unbiased account of the Chevron situation with the balance of the press devoted to editorial comment from the other campus papers. Unfortunately CUP had already told the Chevron staff to go ahead.

Last Tuesday we stated our view that the move by Shane Roberts to down the Chevron was "a serious affront to the freedom of the press." We believe in this statement. From all reports, Roberts overreacted to the possibility of Anti-Imperialist Alliance domination of the paper. We believe, though, that for the Canadian University Press to give Chevron the money to produce its own version of the Waterloo situation is a serious affront to the ethics of campus journalism.

Employment major concern

VANCOUVER [CUP] - A special government commission's recommendations for the establishment of a multi-campus university in the B.C. interior which has been largely favored by student leaders has come under attack from several university officials.

University of British Columbia president Douglas Kenny called the report of the Winegard commission simplistic and unrealistic because it grossly underestimated capital and operating costs.

As a one-person commission former University of Guelph president William Winegard proposed the establishment of four interior university campuses after holding a series of hearings across the province this summer.

The report follows the recommendations of the B.C. Students Federation except that it does not advocate administrative autonomy for the institution until 1990.

Winegard proposed the campuses be satellites of Simon Fraser University, replacing Notre Dame University in Nelson which will be closed by the Socred government after this academic year.

Kenny said the report underestimated capital costs and that the university would require three times the number of faculty Winegard estimates at 10 per campus.

NDU student union president Terry Peterson, whose council has been fighting the closure of NDU, also thought the number of faculty proposed was inadequate, but felt the report appears to reflect the desires of NDU students for a decentralized campus which would be part of the proposed university.

But he disagreed with the proposal to give degree-granting powers to SFU because it removed the institutions from direct community control.

Queen's and National Students Day

EDMONTON [CUP] - The University of Alberta students union will not support the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) in its day of protest October 14 against the federal government's wage and price controls, the union executive announced Sept. 27.

The executive said it could not support involvement in a national walkout which might be illegal and which would have a detrimental effect on the Canadian economy.

"We can't say whether our opinions reflect the opinions of 29,999 students on campus," student union president Len Aetman said, "and students will have to abide by their own consciences on October 14." "But we can't support a protest of questionable legal outcome where, in a number of cases, people are breaking contractual agreements."

Zoetman said his executive also felt students had nothing to gain by walking out of class because they are paying to study on campus and are not workers.

The University of Alberta has joined ranks with Queen's and the University of Toronto's Student Administrative Council in opposition to the day of protest.

The CLC has received support from the National Union of Students, the British Columbia Students Federation and the Ontario Federation of Students, as well as numerous student councils across the country.

Queen's honours grads outstanding educators

Anne Johnson, an outstanding Canadian educator, will be honoured at Queen's University's fall convocation to be held in two sessions on Saturday, October 30, in Grant Hall.

Principal Ronald L. Watts announced that Dr. George P. Grant, a professor and Miss Mary R. Munnings, an influential member of English for 42 years, will receive honorary doctor of laws degrees (LL.D.). At Queen's, this honour is annually conferred on persons chosen by the Senate committee who have made outstanding contributions to their field of work, the community, the university or to society.

Dr. Grant, grandson of the legendary builder of Queen's - George M. Grant, after whom Grant Hall was named, has earned his own distinctive reputation as a professor of religion and philosophy, author of religious and philosophical works and political thinker. His most topical published work has been Lament for a Nation: The Defeat of Canadian Nationalism. A graduate of Queen's in 1939, Dr. Grant is

Princeton Prof on U.S. election:

"Better fool than imbecile"

by Tony Pepper

Principal, not apathy is responsible for the unprecidentally small number of Americans predicted to vote in this November's presidential election.

"Americans don't vote much as a rule," Dr. Eric Goldman, Rollins Professor of History, Princeton University, stated last Monday evening in his address, The effects of social change on the election year. "But this year the number will be unprecidentally low - they simply refuse to vote. The striking attitude is 'I simply won't have anything to do with the system'."

Dr. Goldman, author of "A Rendezvous with Destiny" and "The Tragedy of Lyndon Johnson", and a one-time White House aide during the Johnson administration, has been for many years an acute critic of the American social system. Speaking at Queen's, he traced the roots of the current social malaise back to the Liberalism of Franklin D. Roosevelt and his New Deal policy of "getting ahead".

Roosevelt saw the need of redistributing the power and the wealth of the power of the country, for so long in the hands of the white Anglo Saxon Protestants, to the other sectors of society, including the Jew, the Catholics and the laboring classes in general.

The New Deal policies were to be implemented through government intervention. By the mid-1960's the continual development of the Rooseveltian experiment, combined with the flourishing prosperity of post-war American, created a "revolution of expectation". Americans now expected and demanded social status as their birth right. Lyndon Johnson, during his term in office, wanted to speed up Roosevelt's initial policies of "getting ahead". Social success was to be made obtainable to all Americans, including the blacks. Every segment of American society was to share in the prevailing prosperity. Goldman argues that this is why Johnson proceeded to war in Vietnam; to contain communism so that American free enterprise could get on with the making of money.

This is why so much national revenue was poured into Medicare, Social Insurance programs and the educational system.

But then, as Goldman proceeded to explain, the bottom dropped out of the revolution. Corruption was prevalent in government and in social circles. The educational and welfare system began to teeter dangerously; an education could no longer assure you a professional job upon graduation. Nor did a degree prove that you were indeed "educated". Moreover, traditional values, such as faith in government, were either lost or contorted or deformed in the aftermath of Vietnam and Watergate.

The accumulative affect of these and similar changes has been to produce candidates of the stature of Ford and Carter. The public, Dr. Goldman contends, has been "numbed". The end of the revolution of expectation has been "dazed" the American public, creating issues which are unrecognizable, obscure and irrelevant to them.

1976 will be the year of the "transitional election". The elected candidate will be no more than "a caretaker president". Consequently, Goldman is not concerned who wins next month. Yet he informed his audience that he would vote for Carter as it is "better to have a fool in office than an utter imbecile."

Dr. Goldman is presently touring as part of an exchange program between the United States' State Department and the Canadian Department of External Affairs.

Canada campus notes

Nov. 9 - "a day of concern"

Rob Reynolds

National Students Day (NSD) may have its problems on other campuses, but such is not the case at Queen's. Indeed at the National Union of Students conference, held last weekend at Carleton, Queen's was asked to reproduce its brief on organization for NSD. According to Hugh Christie, AMS Commissioner for External Affairs, the day will have the theme "Is a University Education Worth It?"

The day, November 9, is being nationally touted as "a day of concern not a day of protest" states Christie who attended the weekend conference at Ottawa.

In keeping with this tone of "concern" rather than protest, the Queen's Committee for NSD has planned 20 workshops for the mid-morning, mid-afternoon period focusing on the basic theme, "Is a University Education worth it for students?" Christie hopes to have different people from the community in addition to the university chairing the workshops. One notable Kingstonian who will be chairing a workshop on students and the community is Mayor George Speal.

In the evening there will be a forum discussion featuring Laurie Lapierre and Alexander McCallion of the United Steelworkers of America. The symposium will be chaired by Principal Watts and will have as its topic, "Is a University Education Worth it to Society?"

Other campuses are planning similar programs for NSD. Carleton, for example is having workshops in the morning and discussions in the afternoon with a full written record kept. The University of Toronto also plans extensive workshops and, not surprisingly, with the theme of interaction with the City of Toronto. Even Simon Fraser University in B.C., which in its short history has developed a radical image, is planning a day of questioning rather than a day of protest.

Christie, as may be expected, is optimistic about the day. When asked if he anticipated the day being successful, Christie replied, "It is the first time ever that Canadian students have acted together on the same topic - in that it's already a success."

Student employment objective

OTTAWA (CUP)—Student councils across Canada will make student employment their major concern for this academic year, student leaders have decided.

Delegates to the National Union of Students (NUS) conference here Oct. 1 to 3 agreed student unemployment last summer, estimated to be as high as 25 percent, warrants a nation-wide campaign for 1976-77.

The main thrust of the campaign will be to press the federal government for a full employment program as its "first economic priority", as agreed at the NUS spring conference last May.

Strategy will involve a brief to the federal government before new summer employment programs are set and employment survey initiated by NUS member councils, the student leaders decided.

The councils also adopted a lengthy list of proposals on the nature of the job creation program which will form the basis of campus discussion on National Student Day this fall.

Money Matters attracts 40

KINGSTON—Money Matters is a new course provided by Queen's Student Services and two 2nd year MBA students, Chip Vallis and Ernie Lalond.

It was designed to accommodate questions on financial matters in everyday life. Commerce and economics courses at Queen's deal with theory and topics related to industry and business management, whereas Money Matters is far more utilitarian.

The course is available to people who are not so concerned with the causes behind certain financial and economic conditions, but are more concerned with knowing how to deal with the financial and economic matters that directly affect them.

Money Matters began Monday night and provides students, faculty, and Kingston residents with valuable information on how to manage personal budgets and finances. The course is a means of helping people understand money and its application in society.

The most important aspect of Money Matters is that it will try to deal with student-related financial problems. Student budgeting is one of the main topics, directed especially at those students who live off-campus. Student loans, renting a house, and when and how to buy a car will also be discussed in hopes that students will not find themselves out of money in March instead of April.

Approximately 40 people registered for the course. The co-ordinators implied that this might be the first course at Queen's offering such practical, everyday information.

Club Champlain

Pour ceux intéressés à des activités para-scolaires en français, il existe le club Champlain. Pour 24 années, le club Champlain a promu le français non-concessionnel à son promoteur, fait français à Kingston. Quelques-unes de leurs activités sont des danses, des soupers, des épluchettes, des d'undé des spectacles.

Pour plus d'information, veuillez communiquer avec Raymond Robic, président, (512 Rue Frontenac, Kingston).

On s'lance-tu?

"ON S'LANCE-TU?"

Les étudiants francophones, bilingues ou de French ont-ils quelque chose à dire? La simplicité de cette question trahit son importance. Jusqu'à date cette année, la présence française dans cette université s'est à peine manifestée. Les étudiants francophones ne se rassemblent pas, ne s'identifient pas, ne s'expriment pas. S'il existe une conscience, un esprit francophone, elle n'a su jusqu'à date s'exprimer dans le milieu socio-culturel à Queen's. (Mes excuses aux demoiselles à Victoria Hall). Nous ne pouvons espérer vivre dans un tel vide. Nous devons absolument nous exprimer, nous définir, créer par la parole notre identité collective française. Stimuler les échanges des idées, faciliter l'information et surtout l'identification des étudiants francophones dans l'esprit international, voilà le rôle qu'une page française doit absolument jouer. Il faut rompre le silence, à tout prix.

L'appel est lancé. Nous devons former une équipe qui s'engage, malgré le fardeau des responsabilités scolaires, à produire une page trilingue. Tout reste à faire, c'est un défi. La page française sera le véhicule de nos idées, de nos opinions de la nouvelle en français. C'est nos besoins, nos exigences, nos espoirs qui définiront l'orientation de notre page française.

Tout est à dire. Une page française ne se fait pas tout seul. S'il n'y a pas de manifestation d'intérêt, il n'y a pas de page française, c'est simple que ça. Nous devons choisir l'effort de parler, ou de vivre en silence.

Where Do We Go From Here?

Ronald L. Watts, Principal and Vice-Chancellor

The last year or two much has been said and written about "financial constraint" as a fact of life within the university. These days both the provincial and federal governments, faced with demands for expanded public services in almost every sector, have found it necessary to restrict the growth in their overall expenditures. Since direct government grants account for more than 50 percent of university expenditures, it is not surprising that government efforts at general pruning should have had a major impact on universities. Indeed, Ontario, for example, the revenue student which universities receive at the present time represents terms of real purchasing power less than four-fifths what it did in 1971-2. This is not a problem peculiar to Queen's; it has affected all universities. Such a situation requires hard decisions about where to reduce our expenditures in order that we may concentrate our limited resources on what is most important. We cannot do everything and, therefore, we must select those things which we at Queen's can do well and attempt to excel in those things which we have selected. That is why it is important to be clear about our fundamental objectives and why the Queen's Senate decided in June that one of the major tasks to be undertaken by its Committee on Academic Development this year should be a review of our objectives in order to provide explicit criteria by which our resources might be effectively allocated.

What then are the objectives we should consider for Queen's? Surely, they should be related to and build upon those strengths which this University has developed over the years. These are well summarized by the assessment of a visitor from Britain who once described the strengths of Queen's in terms of three characteristics: Queen's is old enough to have traditions and a distinctive style and character which attracts students from all across Canada, large enough to maintain a full range of undergraduate, professional and graduate programmes each of high quality, and yet small enough to retain a sense of community and a concern for individuals. However strong the pressures for economy and standardization, we must focus our energy and even ingenuity upon preserving this distinctive character and quality of Queen's which provides the basis for inspiring the imagination and stimulating the critical intelligence of our students both inside and outside the classroom. That is why we have struggled to direct economies in areas which will least affect the quality of Queen's and why, for instance, the proportion of the Queen's budget directed to the instruction program continues to be significantly higher than the average for Ontario universities. The objectives I have pointed to are easier stated than achieved, especially under the constant pressure to reduce costs, but as one humourist once put it, "unless you know where you're going, you're sure to end up somewhere else."

November 9 is N.S.D.!

At a recent NUS (National Union of Students) conference one of the issues emphasized that 1976 is a year of important decisions affecting the future of all students are being made. It was further stated that students have to decide now what they want to do to protect their democratic right to education. I think to question this so-called right to education. It seems to me that we do not have a basic right to education, especially education for our own sake (i.e. education for the sake of education, period.) Education is a privilege granted to certain members of the population by the state, the public, that is, society at large. Only if education is benefiting society and directly benefiting those persons who are privileged to have received an education can we say that education is justified. Education is a privilege; equal accessibility to this privilege is a right in our democratic society. If we can justify the existence of the university (i.e. what are the benefits of a university education?) then we can attempt to persuade both the public and the government that the quality of education is important, that everyone (if qualified) has the right to attend a post-secondary institution. We have to protect our "democratic right" of equal accessibility to education but we also have to protect education itself, and this is done through justifying our existence at the university, by asking the question "Why am I Here - Is it Worth it to Society? Is it Worth it to myself?"

Straight Talk on N.S.D.

by Kathy Wood

By now many students have encountered in some form or another discussion of National Student Day. Most of you probably aren't too sure what it is all about. Is it October 14? No, November 9 is something quite different. Is it a day of protest? No, National Student Day is a chance for campus-wide discussion of as many perspectives of issues as we can find. Is NSD an NUS invasion? I don't think so. Sure the idea arose at an NUS conference and was re-examined at an OFS conference. It could have been thought of by anyone - even you sitting in front of the TV with a cold one! From its birth National Student Day has been growing particularly on campuses like Queen's. We have decided to use National Student Day as a chance to learn something about the issues which affect you, student aid, government funding, housing, the quality of education, and to let you take that opportunity to put together in your own mind your personal views on these issues. National Student Day will require a lot of work in order to carry this task through to a worthwhile conclusion. The Queen's committee is working hard to make the day a success but we need your help in order to do that. We hope that you will want to take part in this rather unique event and if possible help us organize specific activities. Keep your eyes and ears open. You'll be hearing more about us!

Student Aid

The constant bind of Red Tape, Buck Passing, and the Royal Runaround Facts of life at Queen's? Not Necessarily.

We will try to ease frustrations when dealing with unyielding Bureaucracies.

We welcome your letters and comments concerning Academic Problems, the A.M.S., Housing, Government (O.S.A.P.), and Consumer Hassles.

These problems will be investigated and the results printed in the Journal. If you have a beef, or some hassle has you stymied, drop a line to Student Aid, c/o the Journal.

Tickets, Line-ups and Headaches

All too often at Queen's events that are worth going to are very hard to attend for various reasons. Lineups and ticket sales are two of these reasons which are becoming a bit ridiculous. The Science Formal this year has been no exception.

Twenty-three people lined up Tuesday night at twelve o'clock, complete with sleeping bags, reading and drinking materials for what turned into quite a party. By nine o'clock the ranks had grown to approximately sixty in number. For reasons now to be explained they were lining up for the remaining thirty invitations.

As in previous years ticket days have been set aside for the various years in engineering. We feel that this day is for engineers in that year to purchase an invitation to go to the Formal, not to buy an invitation for a friend.

It was brought to our attention that this privilege was being abused, that is why we refunded several tickets and requested the persons to line up with the rest of the campus on their designated day. With this policy we hoped to give equal chances to the other faculties.

Obviously there have been a few invitations bought under the table that have gone undetected. We apologize to anyone who has been inconvenienced, and wish to thank all those who have purchased tickets in good faith.

Bews:

Does it encourage participation?

Dear Editor,

I would like to comment on the operation of Bews. As a student at Queen's, I am interested in some of the sports offered by Bews. One such sport is innertube waterpolo. It so happens that my unit has not fielded a team for innertube waterpolo, nor is there an independent team set up. After I found out about this and made some inquiries, I learnt that if my unit does not field a team and if there are no independent teams, I can't play the sport.

What a bloody marvelous situation

we have here. Last year, the student body voted that more money should be paid in our student interest fees so that Bews could still offer the program it has set up. I voted in favour of Bews because I felt it was a worthwhile organization. Now I find out that I can't play in some sports. I don't think that this is a fair proposition: I pay more money but I can't play in certain sports. May I suggest that the M.I.M.C. start working on this problem and make a fair solution.

Reply from pig

Dear Editor:

It is not my intention to turn the "Capitalist pig in South Africa" problem into a running debate. I feel, however, that I owe an apology to Mr. O'Shea and others like him if I was "patronizing" or "threatening" in my September 24th letter. I was upset over the original article, but perhaps that was precisely the intent of Mr. Lawson and Mr. Sutherland - to provoke a reaction. A reaction like mine doesn't always help the matter.

But Mr. O'Shea, I resent your jumping to conclusions, and accusing me of supporting Canadian involvement in South Africa. Nowhere did I justify or show my support for the South African regime. I abhor and condemn the same "institutionalized prejudice" that you do. If you can suggest anything concrete that we could do to help the situation, to help straighten out the mess in someone else's country, I would be glad to join forces with you. Probably, we'd be told to mind our own business.

You use the word "idealist" as if it was dirty. It's not. I've been an idealist most of my life; it's just that I espouse different ideals than Lawson and Sutherland.

And when I graduate from the Ivory Tower this year, I plan to become a capitalist. Should I ever lose touch with what you call "morality" (and I believe that our definitions are the same), I hope that they lock me up and toss away the key.

Why am I here?

Dear Editor:

As stated in "notes for future" (Journal Oct. 1), the purpose of Orientation Week should be to achieve the "vital start" to university by asking the questions "Why am I here?" "Why go to university in the first place?"

We feel that there is a better goal for Orientation Week. Yelling, oil thighs, hazing and drinking do not create blind love, (as stated in the article), but rather generate enthusiasm, which is far more useful as a basis to university life than a week of pure intellectual pursuit.

Enthusiasm is a basis for a positive answer to the question "Why am I here?" a question which should arise after some time at university when you are more qualified to answer it. Enthusiasm leads to involvement (intellectually and extracurricularly), and thus creates a more realistic basis for your answer.

However, if the point of orientation is to ask the question "Why am I here?" you have little on which to base your opinion and you are less likely to come up with a meaningful and valid answer.

Pretentious, amateurish, contrived,

Dear Editor:

I would like to offer a few comments on your editorial entitled "Illiterate Queen's."

Firstly, the opening sentences sound, frankly, pretentious. I realize you are anxious to catch your readers' interest with the use of literary gimmickery but your attempt to convince me of the "emotional images" attached to the word "illiterate" is amateurish and contrived. An additional error in the opening paragraph is your omission of a capital letter in the title of Dr. Norman's report, "The Queen's English."

Your second paragraph, as I am sure you will agree on closer scrutiny is quite laughable. Your reasons for the students' poor showing are based on the "panic" (my quotes) first year students supposedly experience during examinations due to an "inadequate amount of sleep or study." If the student is unprepared for examinations, whose fault is that but his own? Furthermore, you state that "...some students were, in fact, unable to compose a reasonable coherent sentence. Now I ask you, is it too much to expect a coherent sentence on an examination which, incidentally, is usually the second set of examinations for most students. (Christmas is the first set.)

Your fourth paragraph contains the incredible expression that "...the deplorable lack of illiterate students is derived from television's influence." Surely, you do not mean that the LACK of illiterate students is deplorable! Secondly, the expression "...deficient exposure to the act of written communication," is awkward and should be replaced. Perhaps, "lack of exposure" would be more appropriate.

Fourthly, the next to last sentence of your column illustrates another clumsy sentence construction. "Workshops and tutorials follow and apparently this system has met with better success." This should be rephrased or divided into two sentences.

Finally, I have difficulty in deciding your viewpoint on the issue. You, initially, criticize Dr. Norman's methods of gathering data but conclude with a humble thank you to the man who has defined the problem. Self-contradictory, isn't it?

Now, I don't want to be hypocritical. Your involvement in publishing a student newspaper is admirable. I urge you, however, to be more careful in your writing lest you find yourself as a bad example in a future report on "illiteracy."

Viciously yours,
Cameron Wade, Anthony Wood

P.S. In another article concerning illiteracy by Larry Rossignol entitled "High School Illiteracy—Just Another Symptom of a General Malaise?", you may have noticed the absence of a complete verb in the opening sentence. Scary, isn't it?

P.P.S. We look forward to your rebuttal on this manuscript.

Ed. Note: What can I say? It appears that the Journal staff was panicking to meet a deadline, perhaps compounded by a lack of sleep or study or both.

Typing service not dead: Steep

Dear Editor

I was distressed to see an article in a recent issue of the Queen's Journal entitled "Typing service Dead". From start to finish this article was grossly misleading, and I would like to take this opportunity to clarify matters.

First of all the AMS Typing Service is not dead. We employ many professional typists, working outside of our office, who are perfectly capable of handling all of the essays, theses, and other material that students wish to have typed up. The fact that we are running this as a referral service does not hinder the volume of work we are able to process, or the quality of the finished product.

Secondly, the fact that Typing Service only realized a $13.00 net surplus last year is not a matter of concern. On the contrary it is something of which we are all proud. This is an indication that our prices are set so as to just cover our costs. Students should be pleased to find out that we are charging them the lowest possible price we can afford. We are not reaping huge profits at their expense. Lastly it is a solid indication that Typing Service is once again on firm financial footing, since in 1974-75 it lost in excess of $5000.00.

I hope that the unfortunate headline of this article does not dissuade students from using the AMS Typing Service. It has served many students well over the past few years providing access to low cost, high quality typing. There is no reason to believe that it cannot provide students with the same excellent service again this year.

Sincerely,
R. Paul Steep

B.A.'s Unite; Hamlet can be beaten

In recent years the value of an arts degree has been questioned and this questioning has often led to ridicule. Arts students have been accused of pursuing a degree that is not worthwhile, especially in view of the fact that people are starving in Bangladesh. This makes little sense because starving in Bangladesh does not seem very worthwhile either.

Not long ago my friend Bert found himself in a discussion with several students who were of the opinion that the B.A. degree is a waste of time. They produced as their authority a column in the Globe entitled "Help the Handicapped; Hire A B.A." (The columnist boasted that his grade ten education gave him a six year head start on life). Poor Bert returned to his room unwilling to declare that he was registered in fourth year English. Not a man putting around trying to find himself mind you, but someone working towards a B.A. deliberately and with malice aforethought. Not always the easiest thing to do on a campus infested with professional schools. In fact it is doubly difficult if the candidate is not proceeding towards the combined B.A.-M.S. degree.

Now don't misunderstand, Bert is not bitter and has no objection to the university becoming a career oriented institution. In fact he scoffs when people complain that many M.D.'s, C.A.'s, and L.I.B.'s are at least partly interested in the financial security these degrees offer. Bert has confided to me that these students are not in it for the money or for the show but rather to satisfy the most fundamental desire in the human nature, sexual gratification notwithstanding. I am speaking of the desire to know what is going to happen to them next year. In this respect, Law and Medicine are the most attractive little honey buckets in the curriculum because the successful applicant will have gained a social context for life. Doctors may even come in handy at Armageddon although Janitors will probably be the real men of the hour when all is said and done. For the rest of those who need to know what is going to happen next the slack is easily taken up by astrology (and sometimes more bizarre forms of Devil worship).

This leaves the B.A. walking the straight and narrow line of most resistance. As an artsie he knows that history moves in cycles and that eventually he will have his day, just as the doctors and lawyers have theirs now. What will that day be like? I predict that the next Premier of Ontario will be elected on a "new deal" platform promising an end to the stranglehold the medical profession has secured on the government research budget. A comparison between the billions channelled into cancer research and the pittance allotted to the study of Milton's syntax sufficiently demonstrates the unfair imbalance which now exists.

In the future, television commercials depicting dedicated scientists who subsist on our charitable donations to the cancer society will be joined by scenes from the laboratory of literature. The media has assured us that "Cancer can be beaten" but someday people everywhere will live in the hope that "Hamlet can be solved".

Assuredly the government will continue to underwrite the hobbies of professors and graduate students but what about our youth? Recent surveys have revealed that the majority of undergraduates and high school students just aren't writing or reading very good. Compulsory training programmes will have to be established until a permanent vaccine can be discovered.

This new society will witness the advent of the private practitioner who may even be glamorized on TV soap operas, society's ultimate seal of approval ("Tune in tomorrow for another episode of 'Marcus Welby, M.D.'").

The Ontario Philosophical Insurance Policy (OPIP) will cover any patient under philosophical care. For example, a man who is deep in debt, chronically depressed, and beaten daily by his wife can visit his philosopher who will probably write him a prescription calling for several chapters of Descartes' "Treatise Profundis". Descartes' famous "reality is non-existent" is sure to brighten the patient's outlook on life.

Of course all these changes lie in the future and are of little consolation to this generation of B.A.'s. Do not be discouraged, the future is bright, and in the meantime I leave you with the words of the immortal Bard: "Don't feel blue, to thine own self be true".

Automation goes camping

The great escape

by Jim Klein

I feel considerable sympathy for the CUPW members currently protesting the creeping automation in their jobs. Former classmates, new postmen, have made me understand the terrifying separation of worker from work that is endemic to our age.

This further byproduct of rampant technology jogs my memory back to late high school, when I read the book "Future Shock." It was no coincidence, I see now, that I grew to love canoe trips at about that same time. No doubt my still-growing passion for camping is encouraged by the concrete in these ivory towers, and a Big Brother TV set troubling me with my bad breath or latent heterosexuality or God knows what other heinous crime.

What better time is there than this, the eve of the last fair-weather holiday, to create my fantasy of the perfect backwoods holiday?

The most therapeutic trips generally start beyond the range of even the sturdiest of half-tons. Proper isolation can be bought for less than a day's pay in a Beaver (the plan that opened up our North).

The joys of paddling defy explanation. Indeed, why dwell on mechanics when the freedom of vast expanses before one renders both speed and direction irrelevant? Time, and the supplies to ensure lots of it, are of the essence.

Shelter, to start with the last of the basic needs, isn't necessarily a cumbersome canvas tent. Nylon breaks the wind almost as well as a fraction of the weight. A thick sleeping bag with built-in vinyl groundsheet completes one's immunity from the elements.

Unless he acquires a styrofoam cover, the camper best confines provisions to canned and dehydrated foods. A can of sterno will cook as well as the unwieldy and outmoded Coleman stove. This miracle product also provides a good excuse to tote a tempered-steel axe which, though no chain saw, can cut a comfortable balsam mattress each evening. A plastic garbage bag will ensure that the (unlikely) future traveller enjoys the same innocent beauty.

Synthetic fabrics make a lighter wardrobe to portage, and what's more will dry faster. (Who's an expert anyway?) Only the most novice campers risk shivering in a windbreaker that isn't Scotchgarded or otherwise waterproofed.

Matches, a most often forgotten necessity, must be kept dry unless one really believes his disposable lighter to be waterproof. I recommend the stainless steel screw-top models available at most outdoor sport stores.

Leaving the damnable clocks behind still doesn't deter the rising and setting sun from signalling the end of every idyllic adventure. A durable modern compass and a plasticized map will guide most any canoeist back to his starting point for the return home. Sadly, though, lingering peaceful feeling is quickly lost in this return to the world of Rolls-Royce status hangups, omniscient computer tapes and napalm technology. It is a return, too, to nagging doubts whether our automated reality has any more true exist for paddlers than for postmen.

Women Unite!

by Sophie Bissonette

Morris, president of the Canadian Congress, has appealed to dentists and women to join the strike on October 14th. The controls imposed by the federal government together with the Ontario government's health and social service cutbacks are a direct attack on women in several ways.

Women now form almost one third of the Canadian labour force and the rate of participation is increasing. Yet women are used as a cheap pool of labor. They are more filling positions in the service sector with low job security, low pay and mobility and little control over the work process. They are being replaced and consequently are receiving low wages.

A telephone operator received an average of $118 a week in Kingston in 1974 while a typist received $115 per week for many years of service with a company, a senior typist can expect a 12 percent raise.

Women consistently fill lowest echelon positions with little or no chance at promotion for positions of responsibility and are hired and fired according to the needs of the company or the employer. The 1971 census reports that the average income for women in Kingston was $3,187 compared with $7,061 for men. Conditions at Queen's University are no different from elsewhere if not actually worse.

Low-paid, unorganized workers are the most vulnerable to the controls and cutbacks. They don't have a union's power to protect them against rising prices. Unorganized workers can engage in collective bargaining to catch up with inflation and can use powerful tools such as general strikes when all else fails. The present unions are the only defence the unorganized (most of whom are women) have against the wage money supply

Anti-Inflation Guidelines

by Gerry Lewarne

A major part of the anti-inflation programme, not very well understood by most people, is the role of the money supply and how it can be used to influence the level of prices.

Essentially, it is believed by most economists that a country can speed up or slow down the inflation rate by increasing or decreasing the flow of new money into the economy.

In the past 15 years, Canada's money supply has been growing at a rate of about 20 percent. Now that inflation has become a major problem, this rate of flow is coming under a great deal of scrutiny by the powers that be in Canada. In early September of 1975 Gerald Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada, our central bank, said in a major address that he wishes to see a tightening of the money supply. This has meant interest rates on loans have increased, due to the relative shortage of money that the banks have to lend.

The reason that cutting back the money supply will lower the inflation rate is, theoretically, that consumers will have less money to spend and there consequently will not be as much money chasing the available goods in the economy. This has inevitably led to some outcry from various interest groups.

One complaint about the tight money policy has come from a large group of people, most notably Dian Cohen, an economist from Montreal. She has said that high interest rates have led to higher costs of production, since most businesses must borrow to produce goods. At face value this would appear to be true, except for the fact the interest costs make up only a small proportion of the cost of goods.

Another criticism has been that high interest rates have meant high mortgage rates, denying home ownership to middle-income families. This is also true, but here one must trade off to get the least of many evils. Prime Minister Trudeau has made it quite clear that Canadians must sacrifice certain things in the short run in order to prosper in the long run. A decline in housing starts appears to be one of those sacrifices. Also, it may be a good thing that mortgage rates have gone sky high as the growth rate of Toronto is clearly turning that city into a despotic urban centre.

One criticism which does stand up under close scrutiny comes from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald:

"The bank of Canada has moved to raise interest rates, which... is a method of rationing credit to the advantage of the strong and the disadvantage of the weak."

Tight money and high rates have always been one of the weapons to maintain regional disparity. The objective stated is desirable in broad terms, and is intended to ensure that inflationary conditions are checked and that the economy does not overheat.

"Without a determined effort by government to put compensatory investment in the weaker regions, such as Atlantic Canada, tight money and high interest rates applied across the board simply reinforce the status quo." (September 4, 1975)

Many people could jump to the conclusion that what is true for Atlantic Canada is also true for the poor company or individual. However, Judith Maxwell of the C.D. Howe Research Institute points, "the real rate of interest lenders are getting (after deducting inflation) is only about 2.5 percent, which is not high."

controls and the cutbacks. Unorganized workers can pull the unorganized behind them to gain wage increases.

While the controls force more and more women to enter the labor market in order to supplement their husbands' incomes or to feed themselves and their children in the face of inflation, the daycare cutbacks ensure that women will have to do so at an enormous sacrifice. Women are forced to either rely on inadequate babysitting arrangements or to forego working outside the home entirely, then needing to go on welfare.

The vicious attack by the Ontario government against welfare mothers is another example of the horrendous predicament women find themselves in. While transportation costs are increasing and child-care services are cut back, welfare women are required to work outside the home for wages that often will not support either themselves nor their children.

Moreover, the majority of welfare recipients are considered unemployed and their situation is in no way enviable.

Yet women are expected to take the blame for the governments' failures - firstly for the rising taxes (because they abuse the welfare system) and secondly, for the rising unemployment rate (because they are entering the labor force at the expense of men).

The power of women is grossly underestimated. Our potential lies in our numbers. Past strikes and mass protests by women have demonstrated the effectiveness of the organization and collective action. While unions are the organizational tools of working women, we must make sure that we control them.

All women must go out on October 14th to defeat the wage controls and the cutbacks. We must make sure that our voice is heard.

Rose Johnstone is a professor of Biochemistry at McGill University.

Rose Johnstone

When I first embarked on a survey of Women in Canadian Engineering Schools, I anticipated that 30 years after my own student days, the status quo would have remained unchanged. It is true that with such a frame of mind any departure from the original state could only be an improvement. Nonetheless, my reaction to the responses was remarkably euphoric. Several Engineering Schools in Canada have made decisions to make women visible in Engineering No, women are not swelling the ranks of Engineering Schools, nor is the staff becoming predominantly female, yet a positive effort was underway to make engineering a profession for the two basic varieties of mankind.

I started to survey the Engineering Schools in the fall of 1975. I wrote to all Deans of Engineering Schools in Canada asking them whether they were considering any measures to change the predominantly male image of the Engineering Profession and if they had inaugurated any measures, the degree of success and the responses they have had. The view expressed in the letter to the Deans of Engineering was that unless there was an overt and sincere attempt made to encourage women to change their views about their career options, the status quo vis a vis "male" professions and "female" professions was unlikely to change perceptibly in our lifetimes. Moreover, since cultural changes of this type occur very slowly, one must expect to wait some years before a change in pattern is evident.

The letter to the Deans of Engineering also enquired about the progress in hiring women in Faculties of Engineering, recognizing that the presence of female engineers in Engineering Schools would assist in dispelling the view that Engineering was for men only.

I had an additional motive in making these enquiries. It seemed likely that some Engineering Schools would be more advanced than others in attracting female students and it seemed possible that the success stories of some might encourage other schools to initiate changes in recruiting practices, and encourage universities without recruiting schemes to become disposed in their favour. I sincerely believe that if universities of Canada undertook an intensive campaign aimed at pre-university students which encouraged women to enter Engineering, and provided information and guidance to young women to assure them that:

(1) engineering need not be a male enclave,

(2) women can (and do) become successful engineers,

(3) job opportunities are available for women as engineers in the academic and business milieu, We would see a gradual, but nonetheless visible change in women's attitudes towards selection of Engineering as a profession.

The information obtained from universities that responded was very heartening. Viewing first the question of female enrollment in Engineering, it is quite evident that the universities of Ontario and the Western provinces have made the most progress in attracting female students. Those universities with the highest increase in female enrollment in Engineering also had a scheme for visiting students and/or some other form of contact in a pre-university milieu. Although the number of female students is nowhere near that of male students, the numbers suggest a steady progress, particularly where efforts have been made to approach students before they begin their university training.

The representatives from many Canadian Engineering Schools are trying to meet students in the high schools and discuss career prospects with students. With the nominal amount of information collected and the absence of controls and statistical analyses, it is not possible to determine the efficacy of these measures at the present time. The increase in enrollment is the best evidence that the measures are beginning to show effect.

The changes in the last four years have been very significant in all of the schools which submitted information. Whether the change is here to stay or is just a passing flurry is still unknown. The University of Toronto submitted a long-term analysis (since 1900) of women's presence in Engineering. Once before (in the late forties) there was a brief increase in the number of women enrolled in Engineering which disappeared with the advent of the fifties. Perhaps the present trends will be sustained.

Although the majority of people do not enter university-trained professions, the events at the university do have a profound effect on the community at large. Changes in career selection and self-image of women at the university are bound to have an effect on career selection outside the groves of academe. A movement away from stereotyping of nursing and engineering as sex-linked professions is bound to have an impact on work in investment areas as well as garage maintenance.

The least change in the complexion of Engineering Schools is in the present of female engineers on the faculty. It is recognized, of course that if their number is small in the training force, it will be smaller still in the teaching ranks. However, none of the universities actually reported that special efforts had been made to attract or seek out female faculty. This may simply reflect days of the shrinking university coupled with the knowledge that female engineers are too few and between.

To end on a more optimistic note it can only be hoped that as numbers increase amongst students and practicing engineers, universities will also modify their hiring practices. With a little effort might even be possible to find female engineers in other than a representation at all Canadian universities.

Flying to a straight

by Lyse Doucet

Saturday...8:00 a.m....the phone...the phone. It's Ron, "Are you ready? We have to catch our plane for today's poker run." Plane? Poker run? Finally, through the fog of sleepiness, remembrance strikes.

The day is cool but the sky is clearing. Fair weather to join in a unique variation of that age-old game of cards. At Kingston Airport, Ron McCarthy and I meet our pilots and are instructed to draw the first card in our poker hands. As Queen's undergrads with relatively little experience in the intricacies of flying poker matches, Ron and myself entered the rally independently and out of sheer curiosity.

Organized for the benefit of the '99s', a women's licensed pilots association, the "Poker Run" is not a new event for the area flying clubs.

We board our plane a four seater Cessna 170 at 9:30 a.m. I clutch my two of diamonds while Ron surveys his Queen, both of us anticipating what luck our day will bring. Last year the winner led with four kings. Four Queens? I look at Ron...he seems so smug.

Brockville, our second check point, is only thirty minutes away and we land shortly; my partner drawing a seven while I select a six. I notice one of the pilots has two tens and hope his lucky card-picking shows a tendency to wear off.

Since the plane is quite a bit smaller than your ordinary 747, we fly at an altitude that gives everything below a sort of toyland appearance. One of the pilots asks me if I'm interested in learning to fly. "Instead of spending $20.00 on a night out for dinner, why not put the money towards an hour of flying lessons?" A good idea which sets me debating as to whether they would accept my residence meal card as a fair swap.

We choose Smith's Falls as our next stop, but as they have not received their cards yet we continue our flight for another fifteen minutes and finally land at Carp. During this pit stop we are asked to select two more cards for our hand. The excitement mounts as we discover that Ron now has two Queens and I need only pick a five at the next location to produce a flush! We both try to ignore the fact that our pilot has three tens.

At 12:30 we are on our way to Ottawa and the final card terminal. I lose interest in the scenery below, plotting a method of successfully choosing a five.

are announced as the first plane to complete their game cards. The final selection is about to take place and I know the illusive five lurks nearby. I'm getting signals! I reach out...and...grab! It's all over and I'm left with nothing better than a lousy nine.

Ron still has only two Queens and the pilot three tens. I can relate to our other navigator who seems to have done as well as Ron and I. The magic moment is over; prizes are given out and we prepare for take off.

Flying back to Kingston, one of the pilots lets me take the controls for a while. There is almost a sense of power, of freedom in guiding the machine, despite the complications of an overly intricate instrument panel. Images of the prize of $75.00 worth of flying lessons drift through my mind. I knew I should have picked the card on top of that nine!

Sportscasting is quite a good trip

The field of sports broadcasting offers different strokes for different folks and believe me some of us are pretty different. That's particularly true at CFRC where one's only reward for bringing the real and wonderful world of Queen's athletics to the public at large is the happiness felt upon enduring and reflecting upon the many experiences one submits himself to every week.

When looking back it's hard not to laugh over a comrade's description of the "brass monkey" weather at the Concordia Stadium where the game broadcasting was conducted from the stands. For the ten thousand of you out there who missed the trip don't feel bad: the place could barely have seated the Notre Dame coaching staff.

If you get off on big name interviews then the field is all yours. It's amazing how quickly athletes and coaches become real people once you talk to them. Many people have interviewed George Brancato but I'll bet not too many play their tape back on the air through a microphone under the noise filter of a Queen's jacket. Improvisation on the part of the announcers and operators is more often than not the only gateway to survival.

Speaking of survival we almost lost one operator, one statistician as well as a woman with a couple of children, all in the space of one hockey season. One soon finds out that every arena is not Maple Leaf Gardens nor does every stadium have press facilities. Thus requirements for road games must include long undies and the ability to dodge hockey pucks, sticks, and cursory remarks.

Each place presents its own little problems. In Waterloo, the difficulty was locating the proper arena and avoiding a lady and two small kiddies who stepped in back of the car.

Queen's broadcasting facilities are as good as any university in Canada. Queen's is also the home of Sport76, a half hour sports feature with interviews which is heard every Thursday night at 8:00 pm.

For myself, this is my last year at Queen's, and new blood and certainly fresh humour is needed in the CFRC Sports crew. I know my best times here have come as a result of the sports programming at CFRC. Hopefully some of this is reflected in our programming. If interested in joining us, feel free, you won't regret it.

Quartet Canada to open Dunning Hall series

Quartet Canada, a piano quartet, will open the Dunning Hall Series of chamber music on Wednesday, 13 October, at 8:30 p.m.

This ensemble replaces the Renaissance music ensemble Les Menestriers that had previously been announced.

Quartet Canada is a new ensemble that brings together four of Canada's elite solo performers. Each has a major international reputation.

Ronald Turini, Canada's widely-acclaimed pianist, has appeared as a recitalist and soloist with orchestra in virtually every North American city, as well as the capitals of Europe, South American and the U.S.S.R.

Violinist Steven Staryk was concertmaster of the Royal Philharmonic, Amsterdam Concertgebouw and Chicago Symphony before establishing himself as the foremost Canadian solo violinist, touring extensively and recording more than twenty-five albums on major labels.

Gerald Stanick was violist with the renowned Fine Arts Quartet. He has recorded on Concert Disc, Everest and Decca labels, and concertized in Europe, Asia, Canada and the U.S.

Cellist Tsuyoshi Tsutsumi won the International Casals Competition and later assisted Janos Starker on the faculty of Indiana University. His tours of Canada, Europe and Japan have met with unanimous critical acclaim.

The programme will juxtapose three fascinating works for piano quartet: Beethoven's Quartet Op. 16 is an early work that is an arrangement by the composer of his wind quintet. Faure's Opus 15 Quartet is one of his best known works. Brahms Opus 25 Quartet is one of only three quartets that he wrote.

"It is difficult to find a replacement for a cancelled concert on short notice," said Harry Cole, Director of Queen's Performing Arts Office, "but, this concert will be a spectacular one due to the uniqueness of the ensemble and the calibre of the artists performing."

Single tickets for this concert are available from the Performing Arts Box Office, University Centre - 547-6194 - $3.50 & $4.50 general, $2.50 & $3.50 students and senior citizens.

Quartet Canada will play at Dunning Hall October 13th at 8:30 p.m.

Records

Nilsson: That's the way it is

by Bob Murphy

Following Sandman Nilsson's last, near-disastrous outing, Harry comes back fast and strong with a winning collection of songs, comprised mostly of cover versions.

There's the usual melancholia, and the love songs which Harry sings so convincingly, a truly amusing novelty song, some rock 'n' roll and a couple of self-penned 'tunes' for good measure.

If 'Sandman' made us doubt Nilsson's reputation as a songwriter, 'The Flying Saucer Song' being the prime culprit, at least his credentials as a great singer escaped unblemished. What Nilsson has always done best is sing, and That's the Way It Is he is singing better than he has for years.

Gone now is the pretty voice that predominated his earlier recordings (The Point, Nilsson Schmilsson). The throaty resonant buzz that he has always had at his disposal to keep him from slipping into sweetness, has developed into a somewhat of a whiskey howl - less finished and imperfect, but very appropriate as such. For instance, his urgent cries to the natives, in Randy Newman's 'Sail Away', genuinely convey the mock concern intended, and provide a fitting and exciting climax to what is undeniably the best cut on the album.

Nilsson takes George Harrison's 'That is All' and turns it into a vehicle for his vocal acrobatics, in the process instilling much more feeling than is found in the tepid original.

Harry also manages to please on 'She Sits Down On Me', a novelty tune credited to the Talbot Brothers. Not only is the song genuinely funny, but it also features Nilsson's best sleepy 3 a.m. 'Set 'em up, Joe' vocal, all set against a backing of New Orleans barroom jazz.

Again, Nilsson's gift for making a song his own comes to the fore as he transforms America's schmaltzy hit 'I Need You' into a song of variety and deep emotion. Such are his abilities that it seems Nilsson could make something worthy of the most banal and uninteresting material.

However, That's the Way It Is is far from a total success. For example, it is hard to comprehend the placement of something as inconsequential as 'Zombie Jamboree' in so crucial a position as the ending (even though the 'That is All' reprise follows it). It is not the light subject matter which is objectionable, but rather the performance itself. Lacking are the real looseness and spontaneity which would have pulled the track off. The overdubbed attempts at this are obvious.

As for the two Nilsson originals on the album (both collaborations), they are successful only to a degree. Neither seems to get off the ground completely. 'Moonshine Bandit' comes closest, again aided by Nilsson's vocals more than anything else.

'Daylight Has Caught Me' is merely the rehashing of a theme which was covered more neatly and effectively in Nilsson's 1974 single 'Daybreak'.

Hardly a success on the scale of Nilsson, Schmilsson, or Duit on Mon Dei, That's the Way It Is is still proof enough that Harry is back on the right track - and that should make a lot of people more than happy.

Tennis:

Gael team eliminated

It took just until Friday afternoon to eliminate Queen's as a contender for the OUAA East tennis title in a two day tournament at West Campus last weekend, but as the tournament wound up Saturday afternoon, Queen's was involved in deciding the ultimate tournament winner.

Both York and Toronto dumped Queen's in three out of four singles matches on Friday, as only Stuart Watt (1-6, 6-2, 6-4 over Dave Dimmer of Toronto) and Pat Galey (6-4, 6-1 over Mike Devine of York) could manage Queen's wins. Toronto then established themselves as tournament favourites by winning both doubles matches against York, as Queen's rolled over league doormat Trent, who failed to win a match in the tournament. When the York No. 2 doubles team of Walter Crane and Mike Mathe beat Queen's players Pat Galey and Ian Dolphin 6-4, 3-6, 6-2 Queen's was effectively out of the running, but darkness prevented the play of the York-Queen's number one doubles match which ultimately turned into the key match of the tournament.

At the end of the first day, Toronto led with eleven points, followed by York with eight, Queen's with four and Trent with zero.

Saturday morning, Queen's took all four matches from Trent in singles play, but two major upsets occurred as York took three of four in singles from Toronto. At number one, Pat Galey of York won over Dave Dimmer as expected, and at number four David Dime of Toronto thumped York's Mike Devine, also as expected. But York's number two, Walter Crane steadied his way past Graeme Hibbard, the hard hitting Toronto number two, and Pete McCarter, a final year York law student, got past Toronto's freshman number three, Richard Nakon. If both teams could complete the tournament without losing any more matches, there would be a tie in matches won, and the tournament would go to York on the basis of a one set edge in head-to-head competition with U of T.

Trent temporarily gave Toronto a lift as they took a set from the second doubles team of York, but Crane and Mathe made short work of the final set, winning 6-1 in about nine minutes.

With all other matches off the court, the Queen's and Toronto number one doubles teams were tied at a set apiece, with the Queen's team of David Stauble and Stew Watt to play York immediately afterwards. Although Toronto jumped to a 5-3 lead in the deciding set, Queen's evened the score at 5-5 on some fine returns by Watt and Stauble's aggressive volleying. When both sides held serve, the match went to the tiebreaker at 6-6. Leading six points to three in the tiebreaker, Queen's held three match points for themselves and tournament points for York. But Nakon saved all three with some great play, and again stymied Queen's fourth attempt at seven points to six. Toronto eventually came out on top 9-7, much to the dismay of the waiting York players.

As Watt and Stauble returned to the court to play the tournament deciding match against Galey and McCarter of York, the football crowd was starting to file in, adding one more distraction to the already tight match. But York was not to be denied, and carried off the title with a 7-5, 7-5 win over the dispirited Stauble and Watt. The Queen's team only once showed some signs of a comeback, returning to 5-5 after trailing 5-3 in the second set. The final standings were York and Toronto tied in matches at 14, with York getting the nod on their one set advantage, and Queen's in third with eight matches. Trent was fourth with zero, but they had at least won a set, their first in four years.

York moves on to the OUAA final next weekend, against the winner of the Western Section. Queen's players will continue play as individuals, with the possibility of an indoor tournament at Laval in November. The short season was highlighted by the win at the York Invitational tournament in September, and by the play of freshmen David Stauble and Ian Dolphin. Next year's team? All one can say is "promising."

Gary Harvey

This past weekend the soccer Gaels picked up a victory and a loss to bring their season record to three wins and a loss. The Gaels defeated Guelph 2-0 on Saturday and lost 3-1 to Waterloo on Saturday. The loss, first in over a year of regular season play, is the last they can afford if they want to retain their league crown.

All the offensive punch over the weekend was supplied by Gord Taylor who was moved to the forward line from his regular midfield spot. Coach Barager also moved midfielder Tom Becke into the defensive line where he played a strong Saturday game along with the rest of the fullbacks; Ron Heidebrecht, Brian Sawyers and Graeme Darkin.

Queen's first-half play against Guelph was a bit slow except for Taylor's solo effort on an early goal. The field was a very large one with abundant open spaces for passes. The Gaels finally started playing a smarter game in the second half and the passes began to click. Taylor picked up his second counter on a long pass headed by Tom Becke.

Rookie Carl Saunders picked up his first shutout in nets and seems to have won himself the Gaels' starting position.

On Sunday Queen's faced a strong Waterloo eleven, last year's runners-up. The Warriors were seeking revenge and played with a great deal of desire. The game saw a new system, comparable to European hockey, using two referees and no linesmen. Unfortunately, the referees were not actually right on the spot and this actually cost Queen's two goals. Waterloo was very much in control during the first half yet failed to score until very late when a forward scored following the flattening of a Gaels defender. The Gaels started the second half very strongly. They seemed ready to take command on Taylor's easy goal after Jacques Shapiro rattled a ball off the post. Unfortunately, their spirit was broken when Waterloo scored on a very questionable penalty shot call. The Gaels pressed for a tying goal which never came, and Waterloo scored a late one to wrap it up 3-1.

This weekend the Queen's eleven hosts York on Saturday and Toronto in a Sunday game. Both games will be 2:00 p.m. starts at the West Campus field.

Bews News

by Mike Gouinlock

The Bews season traditionally opens with the Tug-O-War and Monsterball tournaments. Although the favourites won their respective events only one did so with relative ease.

M.B.A. was extremely impressive in ousting Meds in the finals and in fact did not lose a pull all night long. Their toughest match was against Arts 77 when the rope did not move an inch for 45 seconds.

In Monsterball P.H.E. won their second consecutive championship and completed a second year without giving up a goal. They were pressed in the semi-finals however by a tough Commerce 77 team who lost 1-0 with less than 10 seconds left and in the finals by Commerce 79 who took the champs to double overtime only to lose 1-0.

Next week the Bews hockey season opens. The sport traditionally produces the keenest and closest action. There are six teams to watch out for. No. 1 Arts 77....Strong in goal and on defence, however, they may lack the scoring power to win another championship. No. 2 Commerce 79....Very strong at forward, but weak in goal, their success may depend upon how many people are playing for the Gaels. No. 3 Commerce 77....Like Commerce 79

they are very strong at forward with Langell, Fraser, Nixon, Lutes and Mike Lang who was voted Most Valuable Player of the 1975 All-Ontario Intramural Business tournament, however they are weak in goal. No. 4 Meds. Somewhat of an unknown quantity but they should receive help from some Arts 78 grads.

No. 5 M.B.A. Big and tough, they control the corners but that isn't quite enough to win a championship. No. 6 Commerce 78. Strong goaltending and a physical defence could give 78 their first championship, however, penalties have hurt this team in the past and will probably do so again this year.

Rugby Squad wins big

The Queen's Rugby teams continued their undefeated season this past weekend, with a first team win over R.M.C. and a second team tie with Kingston Rugby Club.

The first team game was a very easy one for Queen's, but it provided an opportunity to practice a lot of ball movement. The fans who lined both sidelines were able to see good "unopposed" rugby. With the final score being 52-0 obviously many Gaels scored. Gus Monette led the pack (in the absence of Captain Kevin Honsberger who was sidelined with a back injury) with solid tackling and loose ball play. Gus scored his 112th career try. Fred DeVries bowled over for his second and third tries of the season while serum-half

Jim Gray tallied another 12 points.

The second team ran up against seasoned competition in the encounter with Kingston as their opponents averaged over thirty years of age. Many Queen's alumni were anxious to demonstrate that they had not lost their touch. Consistent kicking of Ron Eastall held back Queen's scoring punch. Rookie Tim Price turned in a particularly good performance for Queen's, yet it was Bill Steele who brought the crowd to their feet with a 90 yard scamper for four quick points. The final was Queen's 16 and Kingston 16.

Tomorrow Queen's with its injured players returning to the line-up will be hosted by a strong side from Western

Canadian Grand Prix 1976

The 1976 Grand Prix of Canada is over, and James Hunt of Great Britain is its undisputed winner, somewhat of a relief in the most bitter and controversial season Formula One motor racing has ever produced.

Hunt held the pole position Sunday afternoon after breaking the track record at Mosport no less than four consecutive times in Saturday's final qualifying session. Ronnie Peterson of Sweden managed to slip by Hunt's McLaren on the first lap, but relinquished the lead eight laps later and fell steadily farther back in the pack after each lap. From lap 10 of the 80 lap race on, it was Hunt leading, occasionally with Patrick Depailler in a six-wheel Tyrell 34 riding his tailpipe. Depailler fell back in the final laps, succumbing to a constant flow of noxious gas fumes in his cockpit as well as a bad case of flu. As soon as he received the checkered flag, he pulled his car off the track on corner one and sat limply in his seat until his teammates arrived and summoned an ambulance.

Throughout the week at Mosport the man who drew the most attention was reigning world champion Niki Lauda of Austria. Lauda placed second at Monza several weeks ago, an incredible comeback from an all but fatal accident suffered at the German Grand Prix earlier in the season and held a commanding lead of 17 world championship points going into the race over Hunt. But it was not a good weekend for the Ferrari team. Though they had three cars ready to race at Mosport, only two, those of Lauda and Clay Reggazoni were entered and neither placed in the final standings.

Mario Andretti in a Lotus placed third, followed by Jody Scheckter in the second Tyrell 34 entered. Scheckter will be driving for Walter Wolf's Canadian team next season.

The 2.45 mile Mosport circuit drew the usual number of protests and complaints by the drivers. For James Hunt it was "adequate" as far as safety standards go, "But almost impossible to pass on." The surface condition of the track also drew some criticism, especially from the Martin-Brabham team whose cars "bottomed out" going through turn four on Friday, tearing up neat little four inch strips of pavement as they went. Rob Walker, veteran driver, team owner and journalist acknowledged that the problems of the Canadian winter make "lumps" almost inevitable on a race course.

With his win at Mosport Hunt moves to within 8 points of Lauda with two races remaining in the season. The rivalry between Ferrari and McLaren has never been stronger as the teams prepare for the U.S. Grand Prix at Watkins Glen this weekend. The protests, and conflicts of earlier in the season which caused Hunt to be disqualified from one race and pushed to the back of the grid in another will never be forgotten. But with all memories aside, the Glen will be fought by two drivers, one an up-and-coming potential champion pushing hard to beat the other who is clearly still ailing from a near fatal injury and who many doubt has the strength to ward off his attacker.

Fallout

Radioactive fallout has been detected in low amounts along the eastern United States. The fallout is a result of a nuclear bomb test that took place in China on September 26.

The Energy Research and Development Administration issued a statement that said "The fallout is of low level and presents no cause for concern." However, residents of Pennsylvania have been advised to wash their garden vegetables well before eating them. Milk samples from Delaware and Pennsylvania have also been found to be slightly contaminated. Radiation counts of up to 500 pico curies per litre of milk were detected in the samples; the level would have to go into the thousands in order to be dangerous according to government officials.

The United States Supreme Court has refused to reconsider its July 2 decision that the death penalty for murder was to be retained. They will decide by next summer whether or not to impose the death penalty for the crime of rape.

October 14

Organizers of the one-day work stoppage on October 14 say that support is increasing in Kingston. There are 52 union locals in Kingston. As of Wednesday 20 unions had committed themselves to the work stoppage, 26 had not made their position known, and six had still to vote on this matter. About 10,000 people are affiliated with labour organizations in the Kingston area. Local 1302 of Queen's Library is one of the unions committed to this day of protest. Among the others are the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the Letter Carriers Union of Canada and the Liquor Control Board of Ontario employees' association. Kingston Township employees will be permitted to participate in the day of protest without losing their pay. Non-union members may join them, and if they work during this day they will be given equivalent time off another day.

Traffic

Seventeen students at Queen Elizabeth Collegiate and Vocational Institute were sent out last week to record traffic violations on Kingston streets. They noted the number of drivers who drove through a red light or who entered an intersection when the light was amber, who failed to obey a stop or a yield sign, or who did not signal before turning a corner or switching lanes. One corner gave an average of one infraction every two minutes, even though it was a quiet period of the day, from 9 to 10 am. A group of students recording at the Division and Counter Street intersection calculated that 9 percent of the passing cars committed an infraction. One bus managed to ruin the public image in that particular part of the survey. 100 percent of the buses violated a traffic rule.

Millhaven

Work has been going on at Millhaven Institution to set up a super-maximum facility for violent and dangerous criminals. Originally it was planned to fix up a whole unit. This would have involved five ranges, each housing thirty men. Now the Canadian Penitentiary Service has said that by April 1977 special super-maximum facilities should be ready in each of Canada's five penitentiary regions. Local authorities are hoping that this will alleviate pressures on Millhaven, and that the other three ranges will not have to be turned into super-maximum areas.

Justice Minister Ronald Basford recently expressed hope that the Canadian Human Rights bill will become law by 1977. It will cover federal employees, such as airline and railway workers, not covered under the provincial human rights legislation for job discrimination.

This bill will also include the rights of viewing personal files and will spell out a procedure for obtaining files. Most files will be available except for those specifically exempted and individuals would not have to go before a board or commission to justify each request.

Blacks go home

Enoch Powell, an MP in the British House of Commons, gave a speech on Monday in which he advocated the repatriation of about half of England's black and Asian residents. Mr. Powell said that merely outlawing immigration would have no effect on the rapid growth of the immigrant community. He then went on to say that the British government should subsidize immigrants and their families $1,600 a head to return to their country of origin.

Postal strike

The Canadian Union of Postal workers has begun a series of walkouts to protest the federal government's stand on automation. The first city to be hit by the illegal strikes was Vancouver, on Monday. Tuesday found the Ottawa-Hull region, as well as Brockville without mail service. The postal clerks and mail sorters will continue their one-day wildcat strikes until the dispute is settled.

More on Rhodesia

Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith met Monday with U.S. and British officials to prepare for a meeting on the transfer of power to the black majority. Nkomo, Rhodesian African nationalist leader, said that black African heads of state and Rhodesian black leaders had drafted a new set of proposals which were accepted by Britain and the U.S.

Mr. Nkomo indicated the two-year timetable for the change was "negotiable." He added, "It is for us, the people, to say when it will come."

Present at the meeting were the Prime Minister, Ted Rowlands, British minister of state and William Schaefele, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs. Mr. Schaefele described the talks as "very constructive."

Butz resigns

President Gerald Ford accepted the resignation of Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz. The resignation followed a week of controversy about an obscene racial slur uttered after the Republican National Convention and traced to Mr. Butz. The episode had become an issue in Ford's election campaign and there was increasing pressure from both parties that Mr. Butz be fired.

Both the President and Mr. Butz said the resignation was occasioned solely by Mr. Butz's remarks concerning blacks.

Mr. Ford called his decision to accept the resignation "one of the saddest decisions of my presidency," and noted that no individual "should cast a shadow over the integrity and good will of American government by his comments."

Mr. Butz is replaced by the Undersecretary of Agriculture, John Knebel, who becomes acting secretary.

Queen's prof Lipsey attacks controls as ineffective, unjust

Bernie Helling

"My basic reason for opposing controls is that they do not work". So said Professor Richard C. Lipsey, of the Queen's Economics department at a wage and price control discussion last Tuesday night.

The panel discussion was held as a prelude to the CLC National Day of Protest and was organized by the Queen's National Day of Protest committee. Also on the panel were Ed Scott, the representative of the Kingston and District Labour Congress, and Lynn Andrews, a member of the student organizing committee.

Professor Lipsey pointed out that wage and price controls were only meant to be a very temporary tool. The danger that Lipsey sees is that controls, once used, will be applied repeatedly, each time failing to attack the root cause of inflation, and each time causing considerable social "injustice". The demise of the British economy was an example cited by Lipsey.

Professor Lipsey pointed out the paradox of wage and price controls. On the one hand, they are resorted to in the belief that union power must be controlled. Yet their repeated application tends to give the unions even more economic power than they had bargained for. This comes about through government attempts to appease the unions at later stages in the controls cycle, by offering them other benefits to offset the controls. Such a situation, says Dr. Lipsey, upsets the free market balance.

Professor Lipsey believes that inflation can be controlled through a tight money policy. Lipsey blamed the rapid growth of the Canadian money supply for most of the current economic ills.

Ed Scott of the KDLC made two major points. First he claimed that any attempts at controlling prices are stop-gap measures and doomed to failure. Therefore, the AIB could only effectively control wages. Secondly, Scott said that if the federal government collected the $7.3 billion in back taxes from corporations, they could have avoided the present inflation.

Lynn Andrews gave the student's view claiming that government cutbacks resulting in declines in student assistance programmes and proposed higher tuition fees were part of the controls programme.

Women 'cheap labor force' says politics prof Berman

by Denis Champagne

"Women and Work in Capitalist Society" was the title of a lecture given by Professor B.J. Berman, of the Queen's political science department in one of the Ban Reigh Fireside lecture series on Thursday.

"Women are looked upon as a reserve army of cheap labor in modern capitalist society," according to Professor Berman, "because they are easy to recruit, willing to accept lower salaries and poorer conditions compared to men and are easily hired and fired when needed."

Elaborating, Dr. Berman said women are the fastest growing sector of the labor force and are the least organized. "They tend to be reluctant to take the risk of getting into unions because they feel they are more easily expendable," he said.

The dual demands of working all day and getting back home to cook meals gives women very little time to get involved in union activity which usually occurs, in the form of meetings, after working hours, he said. "Middle class women in the old days were more free in that they could work and get help in the home," Dr. Berman stated.

The acquisition of additional hired help within the home by working women is frowned upon in modern society, according to Professor Berman.

The lecture was directed at women who are trying to upgrade their education in preparation to enter the work force or women who are planning to re-enter the work force after temporarily retiring from it in order to raise their families.

The type of work women are usually expected to do within the work force, such as clerical and service oriented tasks, according to Professor Berman, "tends to be an expansion of their more traditional family roles which involved serving, nurturing and mothering."

A resultant decrease in the need for skilled labor due to rapid expansion of the use of automation within industry, he said, has enabled the replacement of the traditionally highly skilled and paid male sector with inexperienced, lower paid, unskilled labor which tends to be occupied by women.

According to Professor Berman, modern capitalist society presents a contradiction to women in that it glorifies their role in the home because they are the top consumers and also expects a greater involvement of them within the work force.

The women's movement, he stated, has not succeeded in helping women adjust to these changing demands. "Presenting Barbara Walters as a paragon of achievement", according to Dr. Berman, "tends to make unfair demands on the majority of women who are successful but not in these terms."

The sure foundations

Many graduates of the university system have, for some years, faced grim employment prospects upon graduation. Undergraduate students of Arts and Science are at a particular disadvantage, compared with their more specialized counterparts in other faculties of more limited enrollments and, indeed, with many graduates of community colleges.

What is the value of a general or honours B.A.? Why do roughly 4000 students spend so much time and money at Queen's in pursuit of a liberal arts education? Do the employment figures after graduation reflect the value to society of those educated in the liberal arts? Commerce? Engineering?

Does one's choice of curriculum truly matter or does a university degree simply signify that one's intellect has been developed? Do the various topics available for study act merely as catalysts to a general self-development?

These questions will be the focus of the November 9th National Students' Day at Queen's. The general theme of the day will be "Is University education worth it?" Although fundamental acceptance of this premise is evidence in our enrollment, the question is a good one to ask during this period of general re-evaluation. The theme also leads to discussion of such topics as universal accessibility and financial constraints, to use some well-worn phrases.

NSD will attempt to reaffirm our faith in the worth to Canada of post-secondary education. It should, parenthetically, highlight the abundant academic influence being utilized for the betterment, understanding and development of our country.

Most important, though, will be the accentuation of the enormous worth to Canada of this investment in her great human resources. To what position on our list of national priorities have our universities gone?

"The sure foundations of the State are laid in knowledge, not in ignorance; and every sneer at education, at culture and at book-learning which is the recorded wisdom of the experience of mankind, is the demagogue's sneer at intelligent liberty."

G.W. Curtis [1824-92]

A case against Bird

Speaking at Queen's last Wednesday evening Caroline Bird stated that college has been oversold to young people. The result of the mass participation in post secondary education has been a decline in the value of a college diploma in recent decades. This phenomenon coupled with "educationally upgraded jobs" (occupations now requiring a diploma although the skill level is still basically the same) means that people today "don't need college to do the job but need the diploma to get the job."

The author of The Case Against College renounced the concept that college provides an opportunity for the underprivileged to improve their lot through education. Mrs. Bird explained that "the poor are not poor because they haven't been to college, they are poor because they have no money." Also, discrimination against minorities in the job market greatly reduces the weight of their college diplomas.

A beginning to the solution of these problems said Ms. Bird would be to "quietly undermine the power exerted by academics over the job market." She also proposed "institutionalized apprenticeships" asserting that preparation for many jobs comes not through instruction in college but from actual working experience.

Despite her controversial views, the renowned feminist failed to ignite a formidable audience reaction here. Perhaps the problem was that Canadian society and our University system are not the same as American society and their colleges, especially when described in such specific terms as student backgrounds, size, administrative organization and attitudes. In short, apparently much of what she said was lost in the translation into a Canadian context.

However, more disturbing than the inability of Ms. Bird to refer specifically to the Canadian Universities was her apparent total ignorance of the Canadian situation. To concede that she "doesn't know how they train teachers here" is one thing, but to refer to the "State" of Ontario and suggest that "maybe you have Eskimos somewhere" is another.

Dr. Watts to lunch with students

Principal R.L. Watts will be meeting with students for lunch on an informal basis beginning next Monday. The Principal will be available in either the dining room or the coffee shop of the John Deutsch University Centre and he hopes that students will "join me to talk about their views on various university matters." Later, Dr. Watts hopes to include visits to the coffee shops in Macintosh-Corry Hall and McArthur College.

Dr. Watts was installed as Principal of Queen's in 1974. He has served as a member of the Queen's faculty for close to 20 years and was the Dean of Arts and Science prior to his selection as Principal. Born in Japan to Canadian missionary parents, the prime focus of his academic work has been the comparison of federal-political systems around the world. He has been a lecturer, writer, analyst and consultant to evolving governments and has authored several works including a study for Canada's Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

"the Underground" new pub name

"The Underground" is the name for the new Queen's Pub. In an atmosphere of hilarity, the pub acquired its name after a lively debate at the AMS meeting last Thursday night. The AMS was presented with ten alternatives from which to choose: The Barrel House, The Cellar, The Crown and Thistle, The Highlander, The Krumpled Kilt, The Lower Court, The Oil Thigh, The Shiny Stein, Stagger Inn, and The Underground. These names were judged the best of the 500 or so which had been submitted to the AMS Pub Name Selection Committee, although Outer Council appeared incredulous that this could be the case. Apparently it was...

NSD fails to excite students

National Students' Day is not receiving adequate support from Queen's students. At the October 7 AMS Outer Council Meeting, both Bob White, President of ASUS, and Hugh Christie, Commissioner for External Affairs criticized the lack of interest being displayed towards this event.

Reacting to the poor turn-out at a general meeting held on October 6, Mr. Christie claimed to be "very concerned" and even "pissed off." "National Students' Day represents the coming of age of the student. It is a way to express our views, he said.

Using the theme "Is the University Education worth it?" Queen's participation in NSD is well-organized, a fact which is favourably noted at the National Union of Students Conference in Ottawa. All the relevant publications have been made available on campus, but, as Bob White urged, "It's the people we need now..."

New stores for John Deutsch centre

by Lyse Doucet

A bookstore, a drugstore, a unisex hairstyling salon and a dry cleaning outlet are all to be included in the new John Deutsch University Centre. Speaking to AMS Outer Council last Thursday, Larry Lewellyn, director of the Centre, explained plans for the utilization of floorspace.

Responding to several queries by Council members on the necessity of a second bookstore on campus, Mr. Lewellyn claimed that from a commercial viewpoint, there was a "definite need for it". The new outlet would not provide a duplication of services (such as textbook rental) but was intended to be "a browsing bookstore." It was "illogical" the director continued, for a new business to hope to compete with the non-profit Campus Bookstore.

Eminent theologian to make address

To celebrate their eighty-fourth annual conference, the Theological Alumni Association has named Rev. Ernest T. Campbell as its guest lecturer for the week of the conference, October 19 to 21.

Rev. Campbell, a native of New York, will be speaking on four occasions. Along with him, G.A. Rawlyk of the History Department of Queen's and Daniel Fraikin have been invited to speak.

Rev. Campbell received his education in Pennsylvania and Missouri, and has served in churches throughout Pennsylvania, Michigan and New York. A prolific author, he has published three books, including the "Christian Manifesto".

Rev. Campbell is highly community-minded, and has directed his efforts toward action programs designed to bring relief to the oppressed

Low cost loans sought for ghetto residents

by Trish Crowe

The Queen's University Off-Campus Tenants' Association which was founded last April and has an approximate membership of 1300, has as its primary goal the education of tenants as to their rights and obligations under the Landlord-

Tenant act and property by-law standards for the City of Kingston.

At their most recent meeting, Lois Miller, Alderperson for Sydenham Ward and Chairperson of the Housing Sub-Committee of the City of Kingston, had planned to speak to association members; because of the poor turnout, a more informal discussion resulted. This centered on the recommendations of the recently released Paterson Report, which was funded by the Ontario government and researched through local municipalities. One of the recommendations was the establishment of a cooperative effort, on behalf of the city and the university, to arrange low-cost loans for students attempting to obtain inter-city accommodation. This would mean that city housing development would become an integral part of City policy, and would be of great benefit to the student population at Queen's.

Kathy Wood, V-P University Affairs, would like to organize a commission to look into the feasibility of such a programme.

Standard down, illiteracy up

by Denis Champagne

High levels of illiteracy in universities and increased teaching pressures were the highlights of a speech given by Mr. Ross Andrew, president of the Ontario Teachers Federation at MacArthur College Wednesday last.

The results of studies by 'some elitist academics' indicating high levels of illiteracy in universities, according to Mr. Andrew, are largely the fault of some universities. Some universities "invite any warm body into a university to keep it economically viable," he said.

Declining enrolments, alternate programs and free choice for students were reasons cited for increased pressures on the teaching profession, according to the O.T.F. president. Elaborating, Mr. Andrew said children entering the school system today bring with them the problems which a 'high living, electronically sophisticated, urban environment' produces.

"Is it any wonder that teachers from time to time reject the multiple roles of teacher, parent, social worker and prison guard and replace it with the collective behavior of confrontation in economic issues?" Mr. Andrew questioned.

To be a teacher in Ontario a person must have a licence to teach, issued by the Ministry of Education, have a contract with and be a member of the O.T.F. Membership is broken down into 5 affiliates: Q.E.F.O. for French language teachers, F.W.T.A.O. for women in the public elementary schools, O.E.C.T.A. for English Catholics, O.P.S.M.T.F. for men in the public elementary schools and O.S.S.T.F. for secondary school teachers.

The primary objects of the federation, according to its president, are to promote and advance the cause of education and to arouse and increase public interest in educational affairs.

There was a poor turnout at the last meeting, an aspect Ms. Wood blames on bad timing. "At this time of year, students have usually signed leases, are settling in, and are having no major accommodation problems." She feels the Tenants' Association should maintain a low profile until after National Students' Day, at which point she expects students will be beginning to look around for accommodation for next year. The association will continue to provide information, and if an interest or complaint does arise, they'd "be glad to look into it."

The Association's initial methods of operation have been to establish a number of sections or "blocks" within the main student housing area, borders of these being natural boundaries (i.e. parks) rather than streets. The purpose of this action is to break down the vast area covered by 1300 members. Each block has its own organizer and any complaints from other members may be directed to him or her. The association also plans to provide seminar sessions on leases, the Landlord-Tenant Act, and other points of interest, for those who cannot afford the time to become deeply involved with the association. A seminar series in conjunction with Legal Aid is also being planned for next year, to inform members of their rights and obligations under rent review, which is to come into effect in July, 1977.

Campus Comment

Since the Canadian Labour Congress General Strike is being held today, Campus Comment questioned Queen's students whether or not they would support the strike.

(Campus Comment will be a weekly column, dealing with university, national and international topics of concern to all).

Wendy Olding (Phys Ed '77)

Wendy does not support the general strike because "although Wage and Price Controls don't work, (in fact Trudeau even said they didn't work), no one has come out with an alternate solution." She felt that going out on strike was not "a constructive action. Students are part of the labour movement in that we get the benefits - unemployment insurance, income tax rebates, etc. An individual's contribution will not really affect anything. If nothing else, the Wage and Price Controls have slowed things down."

Douglas Brown (Graduate Studies - History)

Douglas felt that although "university students are not directly affected by Wage and Price Controls, it is a good thing to go out on strike because the unions deserve support. They are fighting a pretty basic fight for their own survival and integrity. It would be great if Wage and Price Controls tended less towards a corporatist model of society where everything is controlled for the benefit of the elite. The controls are not for the general working people."

Ross Sutherland (3rd yr. Politics)

Ross supports the general strike on the grounds that it "is a move towards developing a more equal and just society in the world." He felt that it had both short- and long-term repercussions. "It has the effect of getting rid of an unjust law that is causing inequalities" as well as "developing a strong labour movement. A strong labour movement is the only thing that can bring about a political change towards a legal and true society."

Ross felt that "students can play an important part in developing this movement for social change." As well, they are "affected by a series of injustices in the field of education, such as cutbacks."

He concluded by saying that "there is no neutral position... basically you must take a stand with demonstration for what you think is just, and if not, you are effectively taking a stand for the status quo. While you're reading this, you could be at the rally!"

Donna Wood (Psychology '78)

Donna was totally in favour of the general strike, since "it seems that all the wages have been frozen, but there has been no price freeze." Donna felt that students will comprise a large part of the labour force and, therefore, that they should give "a bit of voice to the cause." She felt it was "a personal decision" to boycott classes, since at this stage "students should be individuals."

When questioned as to whether or not she felt student involvement and support of the Strike would important, she answered "we will be heard."

Ban abortion on demand says British visitor here

Annette Nicholson

Abortion is a matter of destroying a baby, said Joanna Nash, from the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children (SPUC), at Queen's last Thursday night. Ms. Nash, an Englishwoman, is conducting a tour of Canada and the United States in her quest to make abortion on demand illegal.

Since 1967 in Britain abortion has been available virtually on demand.

An abortion is legal if the woman were to suffer from mental or physical distress in having the baby, if previous children were to suffer from the arrival of another or if there is a reasonable chance of the child being born handicapped.

Ms. Nash felt that there is great social pressure on the unmarried mother-to-be to have an abortion.

The girl is considered irresponsible if she wants to keep the baby. Ms. Nash attributed this to a general callousness toward unborn children and to girls' feelings.

Ms. Nash joined the SPUC, not out of religious fervour although she is a practising Christian, but because abortion seemed to her "an obvious destruction of human life." She would like to see Britain return to the 1929 Preservation of Life Act, which states that life should be preserved at all times. Therefore if the life of the mother were endangered by the pregnancy, an abortion would then be legal.

According to Ms. Nash the pro-life movement is growing. At the last SPUC rally 100,000 people marched in silence through the streets of London. Ms. Nash is optimistic that the political climate is changing, there is now an amendment before the British Parliament which would reduce the availability of abortions and the abuses in the system.

Ms. Nash conceded that she was unfamiliar with the Canadian situation, but indicated that Britain's experience might have some bearing on Canadian social climate with regard to the abortion issue.

Engineers invade Vic

by Rob Reynolds and Debra Sigler

Following a Clark Hall Smoker, for their year, members of Science '79 decided to "raid" Victoria Hall and in the process broke one of the new electronically controlled doors.

One engineer was apprehended by night watchmen Vic Lee, but according to Chief Science Constable Mark Thomas, "The fellow who got in did not kick the door in."

Thomas stated that following the Smoker the '79 Engineers proceeded to Victoria Hall, pursued by the Deputy Chief Constable and other Science Constables. The Constables blocked the front entrance but the group proceeded to the 'D' Wing entrance of Victoria Hall.

Members of the group gained entrance to the building by breaking the door before the Constables could stop them. When the engineers entered Vic Lee apprehended one of their number. The engineer was released, but not before Lee had recorded his name and student number.

When questioned Vic Lee refused to comment on the incident. Women's Residence Council President, Sarah Jane Hope, at first denied - when interviewed - that any damage had occurred. She did however, later reveal that the extent of the damage could not be commented on "until Physical Plant has a chance to assess it."

Chief science constable Thomas expressed his desire for better communication between the Engineering Society and the WRC, so that in the future such incidents could be controlled before damage occurs.

Uganda pres. prosecutes VD victims

KAMPALA (ENS-CUP) --- The government of Idi Amin has ordered Uganda's Justice Ministry to draw up new laws for prosecuting Ugandans suffering from venereal disease. Ironically, Amin himself is believed to suffer from syphilis.

According to Dr. Maurice Ashael, an Israeli psychiatrist who served as an adviser to the Ugandan government from 1969 to 1972, Amin has suffered brain damage due to an advanced state of syphilis.

Now Amin apparently wants to crack down on others who share his affliction. According to Uganda Radio, the nation's Defense Council has appealed to citizens "in possession of concrete evidence" to report VD victims to the people.

fortunate families, for extending the period of adolescence. In our society (thanks to good nutrition, medical care, and a generally wealthy life) physical maturity occurs early, and youth have incredible energy and curiosity. It is necessary to have the societal capacity to channel these young people. If the society does not have full employment, or does not require that children take adult roles early for one reason or another, then there must be some custom or mechanism for extending childhood for a suitable time.

The university may be necessary, in our complicated society, to prepare social leaders adequately for their sophisticated tasks. This position could be defended by pointing out that the demand for specialization and division-of-labour, at every level of life, is due to the fast pace of change, which makes it impossible for an individual to keep abreast of material relevant to the discharge of his or her duties. The university may be the only means by which the best and the brightest children can be socialized. Stability and continuance of our particular economic way of life can occur only if there are strong cultural demands placed on capable and intelligent people who, without social pressures, might seek to alter the current way of living. It seems entirely plausible that a university and the entire educational system would exhibit a bias strongly in favor of the 'way of life' which produced it. This must be seen in contrast to the claims of detachment and objectivity which are made for the universities.

If one believes in Social Darwinism's "survival of the fittest" then surely the university is the chief and final testing ground for choosing an elite. Performance and evaluation then become the chief concerns of the members of the university community.

The university is sometimes said to be the chief reservoir of truth and insight. In this case it is the locus for men and information, which are arranged so as to enable students to gain a critical understanding of human processes, that they (the students) might eventually keep the society alive and changing.

The university is a social phenomenon. It must have some recognizable social purposes. And, of course, the ultimate point of an examination of this question is to understand our personal involvement in the university.

Gerry Lewarne will be back next week.

Canadians welcome here

Dear Editor:

I have often been asked whether Canadian students can belong to the International Club. The answer is yes. One of the objectives of the club is to further international relations by bringing together Canadian and foreign students in activities designed to promote greater understanding between peoples of different cultures. It is perfectly clear that the above objective cannot be fulfilled without Canadian student participation. This year the club has organized several sports and cultural programs and I welcome all students to participate.

For further information please contact the International Centre Office.

All out October 14th

Dear Editor,

A short reply to Howard Smith's article, Journal Oct. 5.

After making an obviously useless comparison between running a stop sign and the National Day of Protest (in his previous article) he now outlines a similar analogy using rape laws (so much more personal and dramatic). He is still missing the point. However the rape analogy can be useful here.

Imagine that it is legal to rape. Some women realize that they don't like being raped. So they write their M.P., go on talk shows, etc. None of which seem to have any effect on the men on Parliament Hill. There is a clearly little chance of getting Howard's hallowed "substantial majority". We would say that they had a right to smash an assailant in the face—better still in the... since that is more pertinent and more effective.

Howard Smith (law student), does not seem to realize that there is a difference between being on the top and on the bottom. This is precisely an example of analysis done in a "social vacuum" i.e. without reference to the facts and the reality of the situation. His being on the top provides some explanation for his views. It does not justify them, or make them rational or consistent. In this situation it makes his views dangerous.

Once again we would like you to seriously consider Oct. 14. We don't think there is a neutral position. Either you are counted in the rally or you are counted as not being there.

ALL OUT OCT. 14!

Reader saddened that SVB only attracts 50

Dear Editor,

It is with great sadness and dismay that I write this. What has happened to university students; have they forgotten that they are a part of a society which needs them? To the point - the Student Volunteer Bureau meeting last week attracted only 50 student, (the worst showing in years), though it was well publicized.

The enrollment at Queen's has risen 700 from last year to approximately 10,200 students. Why then are there fewer volunteers? Admittedly, some cannot sacrifice their time due to heavy workloads, but I find it hard to believe that only 50 or so have some spare time. Something to think about October 14 and November 9, or while sitting in the Pub or having an all-night bull-session.

Rather than continue in this vein, I make a plea and a challenge to all Queen's students, and especially to the Class of '80; contact the Student Volunteer Bureau or drop into the Grey House (right next to Vic Hall), and give them just an hour a week of your time to help and change the quality of someone else's life. The SVB WANTS you, and there are literally hundreds of people (children, the elderly, and even other students) who NEED you.

It's so easy to give a little love and kindness, and the rewards are infinite.

Protest motion defeated

Dear Editor:

I am writing with regard to the article in the October 7th issue of The Lictor which implied that the Graduate Student Society was supporting the Day of Protest and recommending that Graduate Students should strike on October 14th.

The article was in fact a motion which was placed before the G.S.S. Council on September 23rd. Unfortunately The Lictor omitted to report the outcome of the vote on this motion. It was in fact defeated.

I would suggest to the staff of The Lictor that in future they make some attempt to research their articles.

Can we edit?

Dear Editor,

In view of the recent publication of the report entitled "The Queen's English", in which Dr. Norman discussed the poor writing abilities of students of Queen's University, one would have thought that articles in your newspaper would be more carefully edited.

Your article entitled "Better Food than Imbecile" with its numerous incorrectly spelt words, is symptomatic of the general malaise of "illiteracy" present at Queen's and other Canadian Universities.

Please let us all tackle the problem by beginning with correct spelling in your articles.

Carlton R. Stewart

Errata

In the Friday, October 8 issue of the Journal it was reported that "The student organizing committee for the general strike... called on professors to donate their day's pay to contribute to the costs of the protest." In fact, it was the six professors who sent the letter to all teaching staff who suggested that the professors give up their day's pay.

Letters Policy

The Journal welcomes letters from readers. Due to space restrictions letters should be limited to 200 words. Libelous and slanderous statements will be deleted without consulting the author. Names will be withheld on request (Author must furnish real name with contribution.)

Belligerent fools

Dear Editor:

I hope that Ms. Andrews and her party realize that by not attending classes on October 14th they have demonstrated only their belligerence to the voluntary policy of restraint which the federal Liberals hoped to instill in us. By demonstrating their opposition to the anti-inflation program, they have shown that it will take more than gentle persuasion to change the outrageous expectations which we, as Canadians, can no longer sustain if we wish to remain competitive in world markets.

The crisis in which Canadians find themselves is due to the leap frog type of wage hikes which have been occurring since the early 1970's. It appears that to make Ms. Andrews and her discontents realize this, the federal government is going to have to impose even more severe restrictions to ensure that we will all change our inappropriate attitudes.

God help us!

Kirk Entwistle

Liberal column

Sheilagh Dunn

The Conservative government in Ontario has again revised the education requirements for high school students. Education Minister Thomas Wells announced the new curriculum in a hastily-organized press conference.

The return to basic subjects in education has been the concern of many parent, teacher and student groups. Prof. Colin Norman's study on the literacy problem of freshmen at Queen's was a timely reminder to Premier William Davis that the open option policy in education does not produce desirable results.

As Education Minister, Mr. Davis introduced freedom from the basics of English, math and languages. This was in conformity with the radicalism apparent in education in the '60's. Departmental exams and even high-school exams were dismissed as being too competitive and inhibiting the freedom of the student to express himself. However, universities are finding that graduates of this system cannot handle the reading and writing requirements demanded of a university programme.

So Thomas Wells is bringing us back to the basics. Will he be remembered as the new messiah of education now that Bill Davis's policy has been shown ineffective? Or will Ontario need a further revamping of education policy to include more stringent requirements to override the neglectful freedom of the last several years?

It is unfortunate that a politician is thanked for such new policies when the credit should go to parents, teachers and students angry enough to pressure the government constantly.

Also, when education is used as an election issue, the proposals of a party are dismissed as mere election gimmicks. In actual fact, the Liberal Party in Ontario has been proposing a return to a core curriculum for several years and presented it to the public in the 1974 election. However, the people did not see fit to thank the Liberals for their sincerity on this issue. This policy has remained a plank of the Liberals' platform despite a change in leadership.

The Liberal party advocates the inclusion of French as a core subject. The re-establishment of provincial exams would alleviate the problem of artificially high marks which is a result of student concentration on math and science in high school.

If the Conservative government finds that pressure demands French as a basic course or decides to reinstate departmental exams, let us hope that the people of Ontario will remember that the Liberals have long been the proponents of a solid educational system and were the first to propose a core curriculum before Thomas Wells saw fit to finally respond to public pressure.

By the time this column appears, the Speech from the Throne opening a new session of Parliament will have been much discussed. However, it probably will contain no surprises. The Trudeau government must concentrate on appeasing the labour movement in Canada and alleviate pressure against the anti-inflation programme. Therefore, speculators are predicting an indication of government economic policy after the lifting of Wage and Price Controls in the Throne Speech.

Any mention of cultural or social policies would be extremely unlikely. Trudeau must deal with hard economic issues if he wishes to maintain his mandate. Rumour has it that Hugh Faulkner, former Secretary of State was pressing hard for the formal declaration of a film policy at this time. Such a specific issue had to be sacrificed to more urgent, broad economic issues. So Faulkner was pumped to a lesser ministry.

This, in turn, creates new frustrations for groups concerned with pressing for a film policy for Canada. They must start over again with their barrage on a new minister which delays the whole process once again. It's another case of politics of expediency winning out against culturally desirable goals which afflicts government at all stages.

P.C. opinion

John Ryder-Burbidge

You won't see me demonstrating with the members of local unions in front of City Hall today. Nor will I support the CLC's Day of Protest in thought, word or deed or even Journal column.

This is not because I heartily endorse the Trudeau government's wage and price control policy. The legislation has many defects and the bureaucratic Anti-inflation Board leaves much to be desired. For example it has no power to check government spending. And its control over inflationary corporate profits is invisible if not non-existent. In this respect, the AIB's treatment of big business lies in sharp contrast to its high-handed and somewhat erratic dealings with labour.

But does this justify the calling of a general strike alias Day of Protest? Certainly not! The AIB is law, as legislated by the sovereign Parliament of Canada. The general strike is illegal and sanctioned only by union leadership.

There are a number of significant implications in this. The House of Commons was democratically elected by the people of Canada as a whole, while the CLC can only claim to represent unionized labour. This amounts to about 30 percent of all working Canadians, and of course is an even smaller minority in the Canadian electorate as a whole. I resent the efforts of the leadership of this small and unrepresentative Sexist or Sexual?

by Howard Smith

Not so long ago I was accused of being a sexist pig for my trained concentration on a passing young woman of notable proportions. I admit my interest was sexual, but I dispute that it was sexist.

Sexism is a word modelled after the term "racism." It describes a prejudicial type of discrimination based on sex. A sexist discrimination involves the attribution of features which are not necessarily applicable.

Women students may wish to play on the Golden Gaels - They may not be permitted on the foundation "principle" that women are "too small, weak and fragile." Even if it happens that a woman is 6 ft. 2 in., weighs 190 pounds, can do the hundred yard dash in 10 seconds, it is likely that the stereotype of "too small weak and fragile" would prevail over reality, and she wouldn't play. This is sexism, just as the Queen's faculty of nursing's categorical refusal to accept male applicants is sexism.

However it is clear that not all discriminations based on sex are bad. When Playtex manufactures bras for women it is making a discrimination, but a valid one. It is not being prejudiced against men because it does not manufacture bras for men - men don't need bras. Spalding makes athletic cups for men; it does so with a valid discrimination between the sexes. No one would contend that Spalding is a sexist company because they don't make athletic cups for women.

Sexism is not just any type of discrimination which is not valid. For centuries men have believed "a woman's place is in the home." Granted, women have proven themselves "in the home" but to refuse to believe they can do anything else because they are good in the role is to unfairly and prejudicially categorize them.

Probably the most burning issue in the latter-day Women's Liberation movement is this very "role definition" which limits a woman's horizons and begets a social tragedy by guaranteeing that the husband will be the breadwinner while wife minds the pots, even though she may far outstep him in talent and ability. There is no doubt that to classify women as homemakers only as a stereotypical and dogmatic role definition.

It is this type of stereotype which incensed the woman who upbraided me for admiring a passing woman's body. She argued that I cast the person viewed into the role of a chattel - a piece of property. This, she asserted was precisely the role womanhood sought to divest. Although I sympathize with women's liberation, I take exception to this line of reasoning.

It is unadulterated horse-feathers to suggest that because a man admires a woman's shapely contours he is necessarily sexist. Were it the case that the body was all a man could appreciate in a woman, then I would agree his values are sexist.

Women are clearly not just bodies, anymore than they are "just housewives." However it is entirely possible to appreciate a woman's "bod" and still account for her other features as a human being.

Until you dig deeper ladies, you don't know whether the observer male can appreciate the whole person, and you don't know whether he is a sexist or not. To dogmatically label him as a sexist without further evidence is itself a sexist act; it assumes that because the observer's a male and because he is looking, therefore the only thing he can appreciate about womankind is their bodies. Coming from a movement so well versed in the horrors of prejudice, this is rank hypocrisy.

Questions

The Queen's Journal will interview Professor John Kenneth Galbraith, the Brockington Visitor, while he is here at Queen's. Any interested member of the university community who has particular questions which should be raised during this interview is invited to submit them to the Journal office by tomorrow (Friday) afternoon. Professor Galbraith is well-known for his wit, intelligence, and diversity. The Journal hopes these talents will be fully used during this interview.

no different than the abuses by the FBI against the Black Panthers and the Socialist Workers Party. Both cases were clearly shown in the Rockefeller and Church reports to the American Congress.

Peltier's trial appears to be part of this systematic repression of five militants. As a result, in the United States, and particularly in South Dakota, he would not receive a fair trial.

There is a fairly good chance that if Leonard Peltier is extradited, then he is extradited to his grave. This, in itself, should be reason enough not to extradite him. I have not mentioned the very tenuous evidence linking Peltier to the murders, nor the evidence indicating that his civil liberties were ignored when he was arrested in Edmonton last spring, both of which add further strength to his case.

Maybe the October 14 coincidence will backfire. If, on October 14, students and workers continue to take up his defense-demanding "political asylum for Leonard Peltier" - the Department of Immigration's very poor track record might be broken.

Labour, native moves coincide

Ross Sutherland of Socialist Coalition

It may not be more than a coincidence that the government schedules Leonard Peltier's extradition appeal for today, the day of Canada's first nation-wide general strike. Regardless, it temporarily brings together two commonly, if falsely, dissociated issues.

Leonard Peltier's last chance to gain a semblance of justice now coincides with labour's major move for justice. Little known is the fact that labour is one of Peltier's best allies. The British Columbia Federation of Labour, the United Electrical Workers, the Brotherhood of Woodworkers, and others have publicly supported his appeal.

Cynically, one might say this is the reason Peltier had for setting the appeal date for the 14th in Vancouver. His cause had quickly become mass-based and militant. The signs were that it would spread across Canada. Ironically, The National Day of Protest may have been used by the Department of Immigration to defuse the pro-Peltier movement. Knowing that most progressive forces would be tied up organizing the strike, the government schedules the case for the same day... that is cynically speaking.

But, WHO IS LEONARD PELTIER? He is a 32-year old Sioux Indian who has spent more than half his life in active involvement in the Indian Movement. Most recently he has been involved in the American Indian Movement (AIM). With it, in 1973, he participated in the defence of Wounded Knee.

Presently he is appealing an extradition order from Canada to the U.S. so that he can face a charge in connection with the deaths of two FBI agents.

WHY SHOULD LEONARD BE GIVEN POLITICAL ASYLUM IN CANADA?

I am going to present just one of the reasons here. Since Wounded Knee, 280 AIM members in the U.S. have died. One of the most recent is Anna Mae Pictou Aquash, a Micmac from Antigonish County, Nova Scotia.

In February 1976, the FBI supposedly found her body, examined it and reported that she had "died of exposure." Disbelieving this, her friends managed to obtain an autopsy. The exhumed body revealed a "5x5 cm patch of subgaleal reddish discoloration" on the back of her head. Inside her head was a .35 calibre bullet. Since then, FBI has been shown with respect to her death.

This type of selective political persecution against AIM members is segment of the population to dictate the economic policy of the democratically elected government, with the use of labour blackmail, holding the rest of us to ransom. The tactic of the general strike is indeed such blackmail.

Nor am I convinced that wage and price controls are sufficiently unjust to warrant such drastic action. No one has proved to me that Trudeau has deliberately set out to oppress the workers of Canada with his economic policy. In no way can this be compared to laws sanctioning the Nazi massacre of the Jews or South African apartheid. Comparisons such as these are emotional camouflage, serving only to cloud an already murky issue. The AIB may indeed be iniquitous, but it is not threatening life or human liberty. And there are any number of legal ways of combating unfair legislation, ranging from interest group action to court proceedings. Has the CLC fully exhausted all these lawful possibilities before plunging into an illegal Day of Protest?

The interests of society as a whole must surely take precedence over those of any minority. In this spirit all individual Canadians make some sacrifices such as paying their taxes, not driving through red lights etc. Wage and price controls ask that we all moderate our previously exorbitant demands on the economy. The leadership of organized labour seems unwilling to give this concession, but has instead launched an unparalleled campaign of labour protest in defence of its own monetary objectives.

No, I cannot stomach this CLC blackmail, or this attempt for a minority to disrupt society in pursuit of its own goals. So you will not see me in Confederation Park today. Labour may have a fight on its hands, but it is not my fight. And I dislike its strong-arm tactics.

Peripheral visions

Apathy and the otherwise meek DSC

David Gay

At this time of year it is the duty of every professor to encourage his class section to elect a DSC representative. The DSC rep is the bottom man in the Queen's political superstructure. He is the fundamental unit, the amino acid, the nth square root in the megalopolis of power, but his value would be limitless were it not for student apathy.

My friend Malcolm became the latest victim of student apathy when he found himself embroiled in the DSC election in Art History 010-A. Malcolm is a freshman student of applied science who selected Art History as his elective after being assured by an academic advisor that it is every student's duty to seek a liberal education ("anything can happen on the wheel of life"). The prescription for such an education is simple; just sprinkle your degree programme with a little of the opposite of what you are majoring in. After all, Lord Sir Kenneth Clark almost became a banker and the academic world is since grateful to have avoided that near catastrophe.

So there sat Malcolm completely open minded on the first day of Art History 010, an early arrival to an empty room. Why an empty room? Because this was the first class and so the probable occasion of the DSC election. Malcolm's thoughts turned to that election as he waited for the room to fill. Why become a DSC? Why become a corporate lemming under the thumb of countless committees and bureaucrats? On the other hand...Yes! DSC meetings would be full of beautiful girls! He would be the only male on the DSC, they'd go wild, it would be a bearpit, a mess, could he satisfy them all? They would be at his mercy. He would become president, treasurer, and social convenor all by acclamation. He would take the $4 in their till and turn it into 4000. He would satisfy their every desire; the Louvre, The Cistine Chapel, the treasures of the Vatican (although he might bring in the Beach Boys for his own amusement).

When Malcolm emerged from this torrid reverie he found himself in a room full of young men, all engineers, all taking Art History as their elective. The professor was calling for volunteers to fill the position of DSC representative. So this was it, history was calling forth the man. If he ran then the class would find out his last name was Quackenbush. But he took comfort in the certainty that there would still be fifty girls on the DSC and so, dismissing all fears, Malcolm respectfully submitted his own name for the nomination. Events moved rapidly as the wheels of our political machine began to grind. First a roar of laughter, then a sudden silence as a young co-ed appeared in the doorway, late, and the only girl registered in Art History 010-A.

If there were fifty girls on the Art History DSC then there are now fifty-one. I don't want this letter to run around in the mire of carnality but it is a simple truth that my friend Malcolm's political dreams were shot down by the sweetest smile south-west of Montreal. Although Malcolm's misguided energies were successfully repressed by the vote of his classmates, his experience does confirm the importance of the subjective role of the perceiver in his approach to any man-made institution. Malcolm's enthusiasm was tempered by lust and was consequently thwarted by the lust of his classmates in a demonstration of the most primitive set of checks and balances in any political system anywhere. Were it not for ulterior motives, a first rate politician might have been born (and Nixon would still be President for that matter) and it is with this in mind that I urge you to support your DSC, if only out of curiosity.

Thoughts on snow

by Trish Crowe

Theoretically, there is a time and a place for everything. Or so the saying goes. This old, accepted philosophy of mine was challenged last Saturday evening, when, horrors of horrors, I observed light white flakes falling gently to the almost frozen ground.

It's not that I dislike snow, or the cold of winter that it signifies, but it's the way it comes so suddenly, appearing completely without warning. I mean, really, Saturday's weather was perfect for a Kingston autumn day; an almost gale-force wind was blowing and the rain was falling at a rate that would put Niagara Falls to shame. What more could one ask for? This is the way it should be at this time of year; a gentle weaning from sunny summer days to the harsh reality of winter. Saturday's weather was perfect for this purpose. Then, somehow, this "perfect" weather changed. No longer were raindrops pounding the pavement to oblivion. A strangely eerie silence emerged from the night, and a foreboding quiet prevailed over all. Then it happened — it was actually snowing! I admit, snow is lovely at the right time and the right place. It's beautiful when you're inside, sitting in front of a roaring fire, drinking hot lemon and rum. Or when you're down south, watching news broadcasts of cars stranded in snowbanks and people attempting to rid their driveways of the five feet of snow that had fallen the night before. Or when you wake up in the morning with your electric blanket still on and look out the window to see the people at the bus stop shivering toward their 8:30 classes.

But it's different when it appears in the middle of October. I'm beginning to think the world is coming to an end. Seriously, folks, what other explanation is there? This earth has experienced more strange weather occurrences within the last ten years than the last nineteen hundred. Kingston, according to the Farmer's Almanac, was supposed to have only sixteen days of sunshine this past summer. Those who were here this summer can vouch that we didn't receive much more sun than was predicted. Summers have progressively been growing shorter and wetter and winters longer and colder. It's my belief that the polar ice caps (from both poles, that is) are melting, and are attempting to converge somewhere in the middle of the earth, as close as possible to the equator. This could explain the excess precipitation which is descending upon us in unprecedented amounts. If this is so, however, both Americas should be dryer within the next couple of years, as these polar caps gradually become equatorial caps.

Think about it. At any rate, at this time of year I'd rather be out near Chaffey's Locks picking apples and strolling around in the piles of leaves, than pulling on my ski jacket and mittens and boots and slushing my way to class. I don't mind waiting until December 23 for the first snow fall. As a matter of fact, that date would be just fine with me.

I didn't write this week

by Jim Klein

I couldn't write this week, but not for lack of topics. Several good ideas just plain didn't pan out. Here, as much by way of education as vindication, I list my failures, along with what explanations I can muster.

Many facets of the illiteracy issue, for example, awkward syntax, have been hardly explored. It's a shame that this is a 'dead' topic, to which we cannot devote any more space.

The principle of civil disobedience might stand examination in a new light. I would have liked to have interviewed the man who, last spring, led open defiance of Ontario's seatbelt law. Unfortunately, no one seemed to remember his name or address.

"Buzzwords" are so often used by, however, at what poor copy my modern engineers and scientists as to imitate the layman. I had to wonder, however, whether a critique of jargon had much intrinsic relevance. I put the idea on the chopping block and the bottom line was that I just couldn't get into it.

I was tempted to argue the case for independent non-secular schools in North York. As soon as I started, though, the Roman Catholics asked for their literature back.

It might be time for a critical examination of "Queen's macho." What a pity "Baretta" beat me to it.

The innocence of the speech of very young children has always intrigued me. I was amazed upon attempting such a treatment, subjects made and how quick they were to complain of being misquoted.

"Transcendental" literature has always fascinated me. I considered a discussion of the twentieth-century masculine novel - for instance, a comparison of "The Doors of Perception" to a) Bernard Marx, b) my disoriented maiden aunt, c) Aldous Huxley. The research notes for this article were lost in the pub.

I have some doubts whether Dr. Morgentaler truly is a humanitarian of the stature of, say, Dr. Schweitzer. Of course any column, however well-conceived, which may become an embarrassment or burden in my future, is best killed.

My planned anthology of "dead Palestinian commando" jokes was in much too poor taste.

The real reason for Bill Davis' 1974 'state visit' to Italy was to write the entrance exam for the College of Cardinals. The complete expose cannot be done, as my inside source, presently on the campaign trail between Naples and Doece, could not be reached for confirmation by press-time.

Some weeks nothing works out. Though that disgusting and plagiaristic practice of essay-selling continues on campus, I can say no more lest I upset my 'supplier'. Please accept my apologies.

Queen's Law Professor:

The United States has used capital efficiently but Canada not yet sold

"Americans have developed organizational skills that have overwhelmed the Western economy," Prof. C.T. Asplund of the Faculty of law stated. The Americans excel at promotion, speculation and technological advances, leaving Western Europe and Canada to wonder in their wake.

Why are the Americans controlling vast portions of the Canadian economy? It is not their wealth or brashness, according to Mr. Asplund, but their knowledge of running things.

"The United States has not bought us out, as Canada has always had a fair amount of capital. The problem has not been in obtaining the capital, but in harnessing and putting it to work effectively."

To back up his argument Mr. Asplund cites an example from personal experience. As a lawyer, he was trying to organize a pension and health fund for a union. His firm was searching for a Canadian financial institution to back the projects which amounted to several million dollars.

An American trust company knew about the pending hearing and asked to attend. Mr. Asplund's firm felt there would be no need, because the contract was intended to go to a Canadian finance company. The American group attended the meeting anyway.

At this meeting "the Canadian presentations were uniformly inept and uninspired," according to Mr. Asplund. However, the Americans "knew their business and were willing to outline what needed to be done."

Needless to say, the law firm was faced with a dilemma. Should it go to a Canadian company, at the risk of shortchanging its clients or meet their needs by doing business outside the country? Choosing the latter route, the American firm was awarded the pension project.

Multiply this incident a few times and you have the situation facing the Canadian economy today.

Canadian industry has been well protected by tariff walls. A century ago Sir John A. Macdonald's national feature

policy reflected the Canadian worry about the American giant.

However, protective tariffs weakened Canadian industry, argues Mr. Asplund, because it did not have to contend with foreign competition, which would have improved the produce. Furthermore, Americans were encouraged to leapfrog the barriers by setting up Canadian subsidiaries.

"We wished it on ourselves," according to Mr. Asplund.

During the 1950's, Canada was on the bandwagon toward expansion of the economy. As a result, foreign investment was encouraged. An outstanding example of this phenomenon was the Trans-Canada pipeline, an American-controlled project.

"We blame C.D. Howe for our present economic situation," says Mr. Asplund, "but that's an oversimplification of history. We have to recognize what Canadians expected of their government during the 1950's."

Canada has been noted for its strong financial industry. Consequently during the 1950's, the Americans found Canada useful as a financial haven.

Canada provided services, a common language, a tax haven, and a convenient location for American firms to invest, assemble and market capital.

By the 1970's, Canadians were concerned about the amount of foreign investment in the country. As a result the federal government set up the Foreign Investment Review Agency (FIRA).

Mr. Asplund suggests FIRA was intended to be a social and political tool rather than a legal one. The government gave the impression it was doing something to control foreign investment, but actually it left the regulation quite flexible.

The Americans, through their ambassador to Ottawa, voiced disapproval of FIRA, stating it was frightening off foreign investment. However, Mr. Asplund says that FIRA has not been turning down many applications.

"FIRA has not put up a damaging barrier," states Mr. Asplund.

"The question is: Has FIRA done anything?" Mr. Asplund cautioned that his viewpoint is not a cynical one as FIRA may be the best regulatory tool Canadians have.

Mr. Asplund alluded to Peter Newman's recent book, The Canadian Establishment.

"Newman shows that 'nasty' Canadian businessmen can be just as 'bad' as 'nasty' American businessmen. There is no indication that Canadians do a better job controlling our industry than Americans do."

Mr. Asplund has not disregarded the nationalistic point of view, though.

"There are dramatic arguments of an emotional, cultural, and psychic nature," opposing foreign investment. "The peace of mind and expectations of Canadians are important."

Again alluding to Newman it was suggested that he felt Canadians should be more concerned about cultural domination by Americans, through the media, advertising, etc., rather than economic domination.

Mr. Asplund fully agreed.

"If you're going to argue about promoting Canadian identity, recognize its sources." Culture grows because of the will and interest of men of genius, and often through adversity.

Mr. Asplund cited Ireland as an example to support this view. "That island was owned, bought and sold by England for centuries, yet it still has a strong vibrant culture. If economic domination was the indicator, Ireland would have been dead long ago."

Tinkling ivories

In his first return to Queen's since he received an Honorary degree at Convocation last spring, Oscar Peterson entertained and captivated a Grant Hall audience on Tuesday. Peterson, a master of the jazz piano was scheduled to appear on Wednesday October 6 but had to postpone the engagement due to illness.

Peterson

Sensitivity and charm

Paul Trane

To the unassuming onlooker, the second set came as a pleasant surprise. David Young, well aware that he stands in the shoes of giants as predecessors, stood up to the formidable task of following Peterson's high paced program. The bass allowed Peterson breathing space and ensured a firm foundation to the extended runs which permeated the first set. The pulsating bass rhythms coaxed the gentle character of a first rate pianist into the lofts of Grant Hall. I think it is fair to say that the Peterson-Young duets were not the school of jazz which thrives on spontaneity, where one member pushes the other into uncharted waters. The interplay of the musicians, gleamed with professionalism and yet was a display of warmth and authenticity. Rapid fire dialogue between bass and piano injected a light edge to the cool, clear phrases of the solo piano, and exhibited the overwhelming rapport between these fine musicians. With an impeccable sense of timing, superb musicianship and an affectionate stage presence, Oscar Peterson charmed Grant Hall in an unprecedented manner known to Queen's jazz audiences. And to those who stayed home because jazz is for their parents, we'll just sit back and smile, they don't know what they're missing.

Oscar Peterson rarely performs in the solo format, however on his first set Tuesday night at Grant Hall, Peterson entertained "route seule". The strength of a soloist lies in his ability to captivate the audience technically and at the same time expose some raw emotion from his instrument. Unfortunately, the solo format drove Peterson into some intricacies not necessary in his familiar trio settings. To this observer, the end to end finger sprints effectively dazzled the audience but detracted somewhat from the subtle, melodic imagery Peterson often paints. His sensitivity peaked in textured mid-keyboard clusters which sometimes were interrupted by such brisk, ivory excursions. The predictable tribute to Ellington finished the set on a lofty plateau.

To the people at the Oscar Peterson concert, my most sincere apologies for the clicking of my camera during the performance. Respectfully yours, Milo.

'Siren' album: an accessible piece of art

by Bob Murphy

With an almost unprecedented track record in the studio (each of their previous projects have reached at least some degree of excellence), Roxy Music has turned to the stage for their latest contribution. In what is surely 'the year of the live album', they have come up with one of the best.

What makes the Roxy Music collection interesting is that each of their albums is significant in its own way. Their first album is certainly their most ground-breaking and avant garde, their latest Siren is probably their most accessible piece of art.

However, hovering over all proceedings, and tying them together is the presence of Bryan Ferry, Roxy's mastermind and rock's chief advocate of "art for art's sake".

It has always been Ferry's fascinating vocal style and love-lorn lyrics which have predominated on record - sometimes overshadowing the music.

In live set, for the first time Ferry is not the sole focal point. Don't be mistaken: Ferry, who seems to improve constantly, is singing better than ever. However, truly outstanding in live Roxy, on record anyway, is the musicianship. For the first time we have a chance to really take a listen to the Roxy players. They don't disappoint.

Drummer extraordinaire Paul Thompson is at the helm here, molding the overall sound from his drum kit - loose enough to let Manzanera's axe soar, tight enough to bring him back down with a solid landing. Manzanera is easily in the same league as any of the top guitarists around today.

Hornman Andy Mackay's work is often brilliant, always inventive and majestic.

Eddie Jobson's strings and synthesizers weave throughout the proceedings with a melodic flair of which few others could boast.

What we have here is some pretty overwhelming talent, and although each member gets his chance at a solo spot, it is when the musicians merge and play off each other that the excitement comes to a head.

All the best songs - "If There is Something," "Do the Strand," "Both Ends Burning" - are propelled by a desire on the part of the musicians. Only on "In Every Dream Home a Heartache" does Ferry hold the spotlight, crooning, at his campy best, to an inflatable doll.

"Disposable darling-can't throw you away now-immortal and lifesize-my breath is inside you-I'll dress you up daily-and keep you till death-size-lover ungrateful-I blew up your body-but you blew my mind"

Here then, we have the best of both sides to Roxy Music - the musical and the lyrical; neither taking anything from the other, but rather each adding to the overall effect.

Sadly, the likelihood of another Roxy Music album, at least with Ferry aboard, is dim. The problem of course is that Ferry seems adverse to sharing the spotlight in any way. It happened before when Eno left the group over conflicting egos, and it seems likely to happen again.

Ferry has already hinted at this and is at present immersed totally in his solo career. The remaining members of the band apparently think it is really too bad that he is leaving but feel tight enough to carry on the name without him.

It seems sure that Roxy Music fans will become Bryan Ferry fans, thus ensuring him an audience. The question, however, is whether Roxy the band, will be able to retain their audience, or find a new one, should the split come. Let's hope so. (Let's hope too, that we don't find the sum of these two components, that make up Roxy Music, greater than the parts separately.)

Classics:

A case made

The time has come to ask our readers an important question: What is the most important programming area at CFRC? The answer is, of course, that they are all important. We at CFRC feel that jazz, rock, folk, classics, popular music, public affairs, sports, and spoken-word programming are all of equal importance because they provide a listening alternative in Kingston.

A few years ago our most important programming area, if you judged by the number of people listening to it, was not rock or jazz, but classics. We don't know what our most popular programming area is now, but classics still provides many hours of programming each week on CFRC and CFRC-FM.

Since classics provides many hours of programming at CFRC, it seems appropriate at this time to tell you what "classics" means at CFRC. On CFRC and CFRC-FM, you'll hear much more than the well-known names like Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Strauss. How often have you listened to the Renaissance lute music of Poland and Hungary, or to the futuristic innovations of John Cage? We're not afraid to draw from the full range of serious compositions, because we believe that for whatever we play on our classics programmes, there is an audience, no matter how small it may be.

With that general introduction to classics at CFRC, we would like to introduce you to a few of our programmes. On Keyboard Concert, Thursday at 6:30 P.M. on CFRC-FM, you can hear compositions featuring the organ, piano, and harpsichord. Carrying on a CFRC tradition of bringing you the best in light classics, Festival comes your way every Thursday night at 8:00 on CFRC-FM. Every Friday at 6:30 P.M. on CFRC-FM you can listen to old favourites, performed by Canadians, and more importantly, you can hear compositions by Canadians, on Canadian Concert. Once a week, we focus our attention on individual artists, conductors and ensembles, on Special Performance, Saturday at 8:30 P.M. on CFRC-FM.

For more details on these and other classics programmes on CFRC and CFRC-FM, you can obtain our current programme guide by dropping into our studios in the basement of Carruthers Hall (during office hours), by phoning 547-6677 (during office hours), or by writing to Radio Station CFRC, Carruthers Hall, Queen's University, Kingston.

Films on Cezanne and Monet at Agnes

Madeline Mills

On Thursday at 12:15 and 7:00 at Agnes Etherington Arts Centre two films on Impressionist artists will be shown.

Sir Kenneth Clark, the man who did the Civilization series, is also narrating this series, Pioneers of Modern Painting. This man's work is known for its interest, entertainment and brilliance. Sir Kenneth Clark will be discussing Cezanne and Monet this week and his interpretations of the artists are first-rate.

Cezanne and Monet are Impressionists, which means that they belong to a group of artists who painted impressions of what they saw rather than recording every detail. This band of abstract painters who worked around 1900 are some of the best-loved artists of all time. Renoirs, Van Goghs and Degass' have found their way onto many people's walls here at Queen's alone.

Monet is not as popular as some of the others; he was really the first Impressionist and did the initial breaking away from the established traditions. One of his paintings was a real shocker - Luncheon on the Grass displays fashionably dressed young gentlemen having a picnic lunch on the grass with a classical nude. It is quite an eye-opener.

Cezanne is of the variety of artist people sigh about. Like Michelangelo, who caused T.S. Eliot to write "and the women come and go talking of Michelangelo," Cezanne is the sort of artist who evokes an emotional reaction to his violently romantic and idealized art.

If you are interested in art you will love Cezanne and Monet, and Sir Kenneth Clark is good at explaining and interpreting them.

If you have lunch at 12:30 on Thursday or are free at 7:00 at night, pop in, turn left and sit down. The films are 40 minutes each and the Monet is being shown first. If you come late - tiptoe.

Bim

A kid full of dreams

by Davis Eagle

I don't know how many people went to see Bim last weekend solely as a result of my preview of him in last week's Journal, but to those who did, I'd like to both apologize and gloat. Apologize inasmuch as Bim had a rather bad cold and did not play up to his potential. Gloat because, in spite of his illness he put on one of the best shows Scarecrow or Kingston has seen. I went all three nights and was amazed that he got on stage, let alone perform with the intensity and drive that is his trademark.

The guest set was played by Peter Stoicheff, a Queen's student in his third year here and a veteran warm-up act for folk attractions since coming here. In addition to his usual classical format, Stoicheff attempted two vocal numbers, one original and one David Wiffen tune entitled "Climb the Stairs" with some success although noticeably unfamiliar with his new role.

Stoicheff also played a number of original instrumental pieces on both classical and steel-string guitars. While these numbers showed inventiveness and technique, I felt that at times they were somehow disjointed and failed to present a complete theme. His ability was best revealed in his rendition of Bruce Cockburn's "Salt, Sun and Time" and must be taken as the true indication of his talent. He sufficiently warmed the audience for Bim.

Bim is an odd-looking guy. On stage he appears to be about nine years old, and an odd-looking nine at that, with his Coke-bottle glasses, his malocclusion and his clothes which seem too large for him. He sits there and talks to the audience in this little-kid voice and a manner which makes you think of somebody at a school assembly who is just about to blow it, and then just takes off and leaves you standing and you realize how much he is in control of the whole situation.

Over the three nights Bim mainly stuck to songs off his first album "Kid Full of Dreams" and his soon-to-be-released second album called "Raincheck on Misery", but ventured into some of his more obscure tunes of the "first song I ever wrote" category as well as tunes by Jimmy Rodgers and Hank Williams. His versatility is quite amazing as he ranged from country and western to 1930's jazz as in "The Slider Won't Slide" (He's Taking a Raincheck on Misery) wherein he approximates some Billie Holiday-ish glissando's and tremors to startling accuracy.

Though he is definitely on the road to the Big Time, Bim remains a hick. You can't escape your upbringing (which in his case is small town northern B.C.) and it seems that Bim doesn't want to anyway, visiting his home at various times during the year, and holding onto the image of himself as lone folkie, though he plans to tour with his new band in the near future.

Whatever he chooses to do, it will be his voice that will get you, and you'd better sit down or it will knock you down.

Wic-ly news

by Carolyn Corrigan

I would like to extend a personal thank you to the few teams who have been participating in our WIC events. The tremendous enthusiasm they've exhibited almost makes up for the number of disappointments caused by defaults, but not quite.

Wic can be a very enjoyable experience if you will just give us a chance. If you've signed up or would like to sign up for a team, don't just sit and dream about it, take a short walk to the P.H.E. building and "hang a boo" at the schedules posted, then show up for the games!! You can even bring a friend or two - we would really like to see you having a good time.

This week a squash clinic will be held Wed. Oct. 13, 7:00 - 8:30 p.m. for those wishing to learn a stroke or two. Everyone is asked to meet in the Women's Change Room at 6:50. If you are not able to attend but would like to play in the tournament following the clinic, please phone: 547-5939.

Innertube Waterpolo is going very well. The happy winners of last Wednesday's games are Addy-Ban Righ, P.H.E. '77 and Law.

Oct. 20 games are: 10:00 p.m. Arts '79 vs West Campus; 10:30 p.m. Vic E vs Arts '78; 11:00 p.m. Morris vs Arts '80.

Everyone is welcome - you don't have to sign up - just show up!

Coed volleyball has had a very large turnout of guys! Teams need at least 3 girls to play or their games are defaulted. All girls from the following teams take note: Vic D, Vic A, Engineering, Arts '79, Law, Rehab, Addy-Ban Righ, P.H.E. '79 and '80 all defaulted!!!

Winners for the evening were: P.H.E. '78, Commerce, P.H.E. '77, Arts '80, Arts '78, Meds Chown, Vic E. Keep checking the bulletin board for schedules and don't forget to bring the guys!!

And last but not least, we have the competitive basketball league which begins its season this Sunday, October 17 at 6:30 pm. All team lists and schedules are posted in the P.H.E. building on the WIC bulletin board in the locker room. Please check to see when you play. Captains are asked to contact their team members and to meet with the convenor thirty minutes before their games, this week only. If there are any questions, feel free to call Joan at 544-8656.

Golden Gaels gain second

by Tom Shand

Gaels' head coach Doug Hargreaves said prior to Saturday's football game against the Redmen of McGill, that his only game plan was to win.

On any other day this task would not have been all that difficult for the constantly improving Golden Gael squad. However, Saturday October 9th will long be remembered by the sixty some-odd footballers plus followers as one of the coldest day of their lives. Gale driven rains swept unceasingly across the rich green artificial turf of Percival Molson Memorial Stadium, thereby creating the worst possible conditions for football.

Gaels fumbled six times en route to a narrow but very satisfying 9 to 8 victory over McGill. The win put the Gaels in sole possession of second place in the O-QIFC East just two points behind the unbeaten and scored-upon Ottawa Gee Gees. There was no question as to which was the better of the two teams as the Gaels more than doubled the Redmen's 137-yard total offense.

However, in the final analysis it was only perfect execution by the Gaels' field goal unit which enabled them to stay in playoff contention. Centre Doug Lowry, spotter Larry Small and kicker Blaine Shore did what the Alouettes failed to do in similar conditions in last year's Grey Cup, as Shore connected from 31, 18, and 19 yards out. In so doing Shore increased his four-game points total to 49.

Gaels began the game with powerful drives of 69 and 61 yards but came up pointless on both efforts. Latham's wounded duck pass was intercepted in the endzone by Charter for McGill to belt the Gaels' opening drive. A few minutes later the Queensmen were knocking on the door again but the Redmen jammed them up on third and one.

The offence, plagued by slippery fingers and poor ball handling, which prevented them from mounting another consistent drive until the fourth quarter. Once started, the Gaels were not to be stopped.

Gaels powerful offensive line began moving people, thereby giving Manastersky and Duncan enough room to combine for 91 yards on 9 carries. The drive stalled at the eleven but served its purpose as Shore hit for the game winner from the 18.

Manastersky picked up 105 yards after coming in for Marinucci who hurt his shoulder after gaining 45 yards. The ever-reliable Jim Duncan added 78 yards to his total. Running back continues to be a hexed position for the Gaels as Woernke, Manastersky, Vanderwater, Duncan and Marinucci have all missed action because of injuries.

With the weather providing the perfect defence against any planned aerial attack, Gaels defence was able to key in on Redmen backs Barbeau and Trimble and held the dangerous backs to an average of three yards per carry. Fullback Jim Trimble scored the games' only touchdown on a three yard run. Redmen were not able to get anything resembling consistency into their offence as neither starting quarterback Vic Pywowarczuk nor Kevin Smith could move the club. Only when the wind forced short punts that the Redmen offence threatened.

Gaels return home this Saturday for their homecoming match against the Ottawa Gee Gees. The boys of Bytown have been overwhelmingly awesome in their first four games having outscored their opponents by an aggregate total of 176 to 0. They are led by fullback kicker Mike Murphy who does everything Lumsden did but better. They also have their usual assortment of American trained ballplayers. The Gee Gees are riding a 16 game

Tony Manastersky:
Rips Redmen for 108 yards

winning streak. If anybody has a chance to upset them in the regular season it is the Gaels who will have two chances and need desperately to capitalize on at least one. Come on out and give them the support they deserve, it may just be enough to help us become giant killers.

Notes
All stars Phil Roberts of McGill and Darrel Penner of Queens displayed their tackling talents fully. Penner said it was the coldest he had ever been but he still came up with two key solo tackles in the open field late in the game. Look for ex-Gee Gees Jeff Wood and Mike O'Connor to come up big next weekend. Alan Jette, the smallest of the Gaels, outdistered two Redmen for a fumbled McGill punt return. Larry Small made a touchdown saving interception but fell 109 yards short of a touchdown on his return. The rally at Place Jacques Cartier was fun however very few fans braved the entire game the next day.

"The Shoe" plows through rain, mud

Queen's runners dominate meet

Queen's runners dominated the Eastern Ontario Cross-Country championships held in Ottawa on Saturday in rain-sodden (3 degrees C) conditions. The Gaels took the first three places and captured six out of the top seven in the senior event

"The Shoe" (Adam Shoemaker) steamed through the rain and mud in 30:39 to take the title, reversing his last week's defeat at the hands of Claus "Sunbeam" Rinne who placed second in 31:06. Dr. Bob McCormack carried his muscular frame through in 31:46 for third place, followed fairly closely by Roger "The Brit" Wheate (32:06) and Mike "Socks" Deguida (32:20) in fifth and sixth places.

Run The United Way

The Queen's Track and Cross-Country Teams have decided to organize a "Runathon" in aid of the United Way campaign presently under-way in Kingston. During the next few days, members of the two intercollegiate teams will be asking the Queen's community to sponsor them on a per-lap basis, and on Wednesday October 20, the runners will take to the West Campus track to see how many 400-metre laps they can complete in one hour. A sponsor who pledges, for example, 5c per lap will donate at the most $2.00, since a limit of 40 laps has been set. (And very few people can run over 10 miles in an hour anyway!)

The profits derived from the project will be split down the middle between the two teams involved and the United Way. The Track and Cross-Country Gaels hope to use the money for finance trips to the northern United States in order to run against high-calibre competition, and it goes without saying that the United Way is a most worthy cause. If you aren't approached by a team member and wish to sponsor a runner, sheets for that purpose will be available in the Recreation Office of the PHE Centre.

So, come on, support your teams and show that Queen's students do care about the less fortunate people of the world.

Mao's successor

Hua Kuo-feng, formerly first Vice-Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party, has been officially named the supreme leader of China. The announcement was made by the Central Committee of China last weekend. Mr. Hua was confirmed as leader of the party but was not given the title of Chairman. It is thought that the title will remain with Mao Tse-tung and is not being passed on to anyone else.

Early this week Mao's widow, Chiang Ching, and three other leading radicals were purged from their positions according to embassies in Peking. These four radicals, the top national radical leadership, have been arrested and charged with plotting a coup. The arrests may be an indication of a behind-the-scenes power struggle in China that is swinging the government's political stance away from the extreme left.

It has also been announced that the body of Chairman Mao is being preserved and will be put on permanent display in a crystal coffin. The coffin will be placed on display in a special memorial hall in Peking.

Throne speech

Tuesday's Speech from the Throne was a major attempt on the part of the government to placate labour. The speech outlined a package of employment and social policies designed to placate labour.

But there is already problems with the major reform, a form of Guaranteed Annual Income, which works by a negative income tax on families below a certain minimum. Complications involve the merging of this plan and the indexing of private pension plans to compensate for inflation.

Other points in the package are direct employment schemes, and longer-range changes in manpower retraining in unemployment insurance.

The program is seen by Liberal strategists as an attempt at rebuilding the coalition between business and labour that has permitted it to hold political power for most of this century. In a speech last Thursday, Prime Minister Trudeau emphasized the role of the market economy, but noted that the operation of the market would have to improve. In order to do this the Throne Speech promised measures to limit big business and big labour from imposing their power in the marketplace. There is also a plan to reduce time lost by strikes.

Some of the other measures mentioned in the Throne Speech is a redrafted Human Rights Bill, a bill designed to protect borrowers and measures to enable the Government to monitor oil companies exploration expenditures more closely.

Planned but absent were a bill on freedom of information and a comprehensive food policy.

CUPE on walkout

Canadian Labour Congress vice-president Grace Hartman insisted that the Oct. 14 national workout is a political protest. Mrs. Hartman, who is also national president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, was testifying Friday before a panel of the Ontario Labour Relations Board. The panel is to rule in the constitutionality of the walkout.

Mrs. Hartman said, the walkout is "not directed at the employers", but is a political protest aimed at the Government. She accused the anti-inflation program of controlling wages without controlling prices.

The OLRB hearing is on an application from Douglas Ltd. to prohibit its employees from walking out on Oct. 14. A board ruling could establish the legality of the walkout in Ontario. A ruling is not inevitable, however, as the union's lawyer, Martin Levinson has asked the board to throw out the application on the grounds that the company has been too slow in bringing it to the board.

Rhodesian fighting

Ten black guerrillas and ten civilians were killed in an upsurge of fighting, the Government reported on Monday. Guerrillas shot three black civilians whose bodies were found roped together. It is suspected that these were three black nationalists, missing since last week. They may have fallen victim to an outbreak of violence between nationalist groups.

A white construction worker, Robert Bruce Scott, was shot as he picked up a work gang in an area where guerrillas were active. A black bystander was also killed. Five civilians were killed by security forces, four black women who accompanied guerrillas and a black civilian, who was shot in a curfew area.

The Government sources did not report on casualties among the security forces.

Britain almost broke

Margaret Thatcher, the leader of the opposition, accused the Labor Government of all but bankrupting the country. At the annual Conservative Party conference she told the 5000 delegates that "socialism has failed the nation." She spoke against a backdrop of British economic problems and with the conviction that the present government will fall within six months.

Mrs. Thatcher blamed two and a half years of Labor government for Britain's economic problems. The Labor government has increased the Bank of England's prime lending rate in an effort to curb inflation and bolster overseas confidence in the pound. The Conservatives oppose this move on the ground it will increase unemployment and called for a reduction in government spending instead.

The Conservatives accused the Labor Party's militant left wing of paralyzing Mr. Cullaghan's moderate government in dealing with the economic crisis. Mrs. Thatcher accused the Labor's program of being "more extreme than those of many Communist parties in Western Europe."

Curriculum changes

Starting next September, Grade 9 and 10 students at Ontario high schools will be required to complete nine basic courses instead of the present six. The new curriculum, announced by Education Minister Thomas Wells, has math, English, Science, and history or geography as mandatory courses. The courses will follow guidelines that stress basic skills such as grammar in English and knowledge of Canada. Mr. Wells said that the changes are in response to public criticism that the basics in education are being neglected. The courses will still be offered at different levels of difficulty as at present.

Millhaven

No special festivities took place at Millhaven to celebrate Thanksgiving. Inmates were busy cleaning up the mess resulting from a six hour long smashing rampage last Tuesday night. 150 cells were demolished by inmates who broke furniture, and windows and toilets in a protest over a cancelled evening's access to common rooms. Guards had refused them this normal privilege when they had heard rumours of a planned hostage-taking. An estimated 300,000 dollars worth of damage must be repaired. Visits and mail delivery were cancelled for a few days, and work and recreation programs are still stopped.

Snow

For the benefit of anyone writing letters to distant correspondents, Kingston got 1.3 centimetres of snow on Sunday, and the region about 100 miles north of here was blessed with 15 to 30 centimetres. If the weather in Kingston had been a wee bit colder, the rain we got along with the snow would have turned into 13.8 inches of pure snow.

In jail

The Lennox and Addington County Museum has opened its gates in the former county jail at Napanee. The exhibits were selected to tell the history of the people and places in the county. For the jail it meant a renovation and embellishment. Among other curiosities the public can view an original cell and the gallows which have never been used. The museum is open during the normal business hours.

Notes and coins

The numismatic exhibit of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is on show now at St. Lawrence College. The bank's collection is one of the most complete in the world and the general public is able to view a selection of its notes and coins here at no charge.

This exhibit contains notes issued by most of the over one hundred Canadian banks established since 1792 and by companies such as the Champlain and St. Lawrence Rail Road. The exhibit is contained in thirteen large cases made of stainless steel, which when prepared for shipping weigh four and half tons.

Short cuts

A health insurance inspector in Gävle, Sweden, is credited with a sizeable number of miracle-cures; he cured one in three people in his town who were collecting sick pay. All it took was a knock on the door. Approximately ten per cent of Swedish workers are collecting sick pay, ninety per cent of normal pay, at any time.

Two policemen in Windsor locked up an open back door of a store on a routine night patrol. Inside were two thieves who later escaped with $2,500 worth of loot.

Qubus Bin Said, sultan of Oman, went shopping in Chicago recently. He bought six Cadillac Seattles, six Mercedes-Benz sedans, a rather large 25-foot speedboat, four other high-class cars, including two Porsches, eight refrigerators, and a few other oddities, among which two five-foot-high grapefruit trees. He paid one and a half million dollars and shipped everything home in a chartered jet.

Dennis T. Sears

Dennis T. Patrick Sears, author of The Lark in the Clear Air and columnist for the Whig-Standard during the last ten years, died this weekend. His death cut short an artistic career of significance. His novel is being filmed this summer and another novel will be published by McClelland and Stewart soon. Readers of his book admire his gentleness, his power of characterization and his reverence for nature.

200 support CLC strike

"Same fight, same strike"

Nearly 200 enthusiastic Queen's students, faculty members and library technicians marched to Confederation Park last Thursday to join organized labour in its protest against the government's wage and price controls. Demonstrators chanted, sang and carried placards as they marched through city streets. Ross Russell, former director of the United Auto Workers' Union, expressed the view that students are an important part of labour's struggle.

Students rally with workers

Phil Cheesman

Last Thursday workers across Canada supported the CLC's call for a National Day of Protest. At Queen's, about 200 students, professors and library technicians joined in the rally.

Starting in front of Douglas Library the protesters marched to Confederation Park carrying a banner and chanting "Same fight, same strike. Queen's people against controls, cutbacks."

Some Kingston residents waved and cheered the protesters. A single policeman accompanied the peaceful march. One protestor suggested the policeman be given a sign.

There were cheers as the Queen's contingent joined the protesters already gathered in the park across from City Hall.

Guest speaker Ross Russell, former director of Organization for United Auto Workers, praised the work of past union movements, which although often illegal brought about today's unions and workers' benefits. Russell criticized the Prime Minister and his policies of employment, housing and federal spending.

He expressed the general union view that only wages, not prices are being controlled. "The Anti-Inflation Board closes its eyes to prices," he accused. He implied that the anti-inflation measures unfairly impose arbitration in contract negotiations.

Russell felt the role of students is very important. "They're going to be workers one day. Their interests lie with the working people," he commented.

Bill Burgess of the Queen's National Day of Protest Support Committee said the 200 protestors represented good university participation. Queen's involvement was a success, he said.

Faculty divided on strike support: for most it was classes as usual

Chris Hall

The National Day of Protest held on Thursday, October 14 produced a variety of reactions from Queen's University faculty.

Eight Arts and Science faculty members distributed a memorandum to their colleagues urging support of the planned walkout. Some either cancelled classes or devoted class time to a discussion of the issues.

University administrators refused to officially recognize the protest, but also declined to order faculty not to participate.

Two other members of the Queen's academic community were directly involved. Joe Morris, President of the Canadian Labour Congress, is a member of the Queen's Board of Trustees. Donald Carter, a professor in the Law Faculty, is Chairman of the Ontario Labour Relations Board (OLRB). The OLRB had to rule on the legality of a walkout by union workers in Ontario.

Principal Watts, when contacted by the Journal, answered the questions from both a personal view and as the chief administrator of the university. He said he believed that Wage and Price Controls were necessary when they were instituted.

However, he said, did not make the controls flexible enough to adapt to changes in economic conditions, changes brought about by time. Therefore, the Wage and Price Controls should be lifted. He did not personally support the walkout.

"I do not believe in the principle of strikes and walkouts as an effective means of changing government policy. The best place to change government policy is through the ballot box," Dr. Watts said.

Principal Watts was also asked if he, as Principal of the University, gave faculty a free hand in deciding whether or not to support the walkout by postponing classes. He replied that "The principal should not decide whether the professors hold classes or not, as long as they meet their responsibility to the students. The university is a healthy place when there is a variety of belief among its inhabitants."

R.J. Ossenberg expressed a different view about the walkout. As one of the authors of the memorandum sent to faculty members, Ossenberg believed the walkout was the only means available to the low-income people represented by the union to express their views and be recognized by the government.

"Canada always has had a vital grassroots movement heritage, and that heritage in itself is a viable asset in assuring that this country remains politically plural. The Day of Protest was a part of this grassroots heritage," he said, "and serves to show that real democracy in Canada is still alive."

Professor Ossenberg held an optional class on Thursday discussing the issues behind the walkout.

TAK deserves help

Telephone Aid Kingston, like most student organizations, depends heavily on the voluntary support of Queen's students. The service provided to the community by TAK is uniquely valuable. Persons needing assistance, counsel, or just someone to speak with can phone TAK anonymously anytime.

An assessment of the number of persons assisted by this service would be speculation; there are no records kept of conversations. Suffice to say, but for TAK some students may well not be here today.

Only five students have offered to operate the service this year. Many more students are needed, otherwise TAK will not be available. Training is provided to people good enough to volunteer a few hours of their time per week.

Both the Student Volunteer Bureau and TAK are desperately short of participants this year. They both need and deserve your support.

Another Morris Hall

Co-educational residences have long been an issue at Queen's. It was not, however, until 1972 that Morris Hall was converted from a men's residence to the first co-ed residence on campus. It is now time to continue the conversion process.

The incident at Victoria Hall last Tuesday, when members of Science '79 damaged the building, exemplifies an attitude towards Women's residence, and university women in general, encouraged by the Residence Board. Although at the outset the engineers would seem to be at fault, the situation in which 700 women live together under close scrutiny and continual guard may really lie at the heart of this and other disturbances.

Women's residences, we feel, invite trouble such as the raid last Tuesday by the expectations of it. The vigilant custodians who guard the doors around the clock present a challenge to entry. Surely a sense of accomplishment accompanied the engineers who broke through to destroy the expensive door in Victoria Hall. Their actions were not simply malicious.

If Victoria Hall became co-educational, either on the basis of alternate wings, floors or rooms, the foundation of the constant confrontation, we feel, would be effectively reduced.

Nobody paints their crest or erects a plaque in front of Morris Hall. Nobody "raids" that residence in a spontaneous display of masculinity for the girls. The integration of males and females seems to develop a sober attitude towards residence life.

Consider what Morris Hall has been like since it was converted to a co-educational residence. At present Morris is one of the quietest residences on Leonard Field; damages to that residence were the lowest on Leonard Field. Perhaps the biggest advantage, though, of co-ed Morris is the attitude of respect it develops for residents of the opposite sex. Although damages to women's residences perhaps are less, the net cost of damages at co-ed residences may well work out to the total now incurred in single sex residences.

We know that co-ed living is not for everyone. The adjustment period for a first year student varies according to the individual. For a large proportion of first year students the idea of living co-ed is simply unappealing. In addition, many parents simply do not want their son or daughter living in a co-ed residence. In making the transition to university life, co-ed living may simply complicate the process. Still, the unfilled demand for a spot in Morris Hall this year could have filled another building of the same capacity. Some students wanting to live co-ed were referred to Jean Royce Hall, others were placed in another residence in the area.

One has the distinct impression that parental circumspection has been an overriding consideration of the Residence Board in retaining such an emphasis upon single sex residences. The time has come for Queen's to further suspend its extension of parental guidance; to afford the opportunity to a greater number of modern students to shed in a mature manner their pubescent inhibitions about the opposite sex.

While it is important that all students have a choice of lifestyle in residence, the buildings should not generate friction and sexist behavior, rather responsible and considerate attitudes. We suggest that the Residence Board seriously consider more co-educational residences at Queen's.

Drivers to get larger parking lot

by Denis Champagne

The Queen's parking lot surrounded by Barrie, Clergy, Division and Union Streets is to be expanded in the near future.

The expansion is primarily toward the Barrie St. area. According to Mr. John Richardson, the Director of Housing and Property Management at Queen's, all tenants in houses owned by Queen's on Barrie St. have been notified.

All land beyond ten feet of the rearmost section of houses owned by Queen's on Barrie St. is to be used for parking, Mr. Richardson stated. Queen's owns all but two of the houses situated on Barrie St. between Clergy and Union Streets.

Mr. Richardson said a visibility barrier will be constructed between the parking lot and backyards to protect the privacy of people living in the Barrie St. dwellings.

These plans have been in process since 1972, he said, but have had to be revised three times in order to better suit the particular geographical problems confronted in this area.

"Tenants have reacted in a resigned fashion," according to Mr. Richardson, "when informed of the future expansion." Construction, which will involve the destruction of some garages and sheds, should begin within a few weeks, he said.

No volunteers, TAK may collapse

by Deb McGuire, Ross Bartlett

One of the most heavily used services offered by the Queen's Community Services Group is in danger of folding due to lack of volunteers. Despite efforts by the executive to keep it running, Telephone Aid Kingston (TAK) is desperately short of student volunteers to man the phones.

TAK provides an empathetic listening service during the hours 7pm to 7am. Besides acting as a distress centre, TAK also provides a telephone information and referral service at these times. The vast majority of the calls, however, come from people who just want to talk about any subject imaginable far from being a place just for "desperate people" to call, TAK's volunteers welcome calls from anyone.

Founded in 1972 with 125 volunteers, TAK is fashioned after the University of Waterloo's "Hi-Line." It is financed by Queen's students through the seventy-five cent contribution to the Community Services Group paid with the Student Interest Fee.

The present volunteers stress the fact that it is not a depressing experience. Calls have come on all matters, even from people who have just gotten engaged and have no one to share their joy with. TAK requires only four hours every two weeks from the volunteer. All volunteers are exposed to an excellent and extensive training program which readies them to deal with the situations they will meet. All volunteers are strictly confidential as are all calls which TAK receives.

At present TAK is struggling along with a very few volunteers on a reduced scale. With its present numbers, TAK's phones can only be manned from 7pm to 3am. The last chance for TAK will come tonight at a meeting for new volunteers at 7:30pm in the Polson Room of the Students Union. A poor turnout at this meeting will mean the death of this service to the Queen's and Kingston communities, so please attend or call 544-1771 after 7pm if you are at all interested.

Hugh Christie, AMS External Affairs Commissioner, was absent from the campus since Friday and did not attend the rally. He did, however say that most people "were not sure why they were there." Some students went along for the ride while for others "it was just another social event."

Bob White, ASUS President, concurred but he was disturbed by Old campus landmarks to be preserved with new $.5 million grant

Queen's University Principal Ronald L. Watts announced Friday that Mrs. Kathleen Ryan of Ottawa will establish a foundation at Queen's, to be funded to the minimum extent of a half-million dollars.

The Kathleen Ryan Foundation will provide for the preservation of buildings in the 'old quadrangle' on campus. Specifically, when the Health Science Department moves into their new building, now under construction, the Old Medical Building in the quadrangle will be renovated with a view to housing the university's archives and special collections.

The Principal expressed to Mrs. Ryan the sincere gratitude of the entire Queen's community for "her generous and timely benefaction which will relieve pressures on the central library by relocating the university's archives and special collections in appropriate quarters."

A further objective of the foundation will be support of Queen's radio, CFRC AM-FM, Canada's oldest continuously broadcasting radio station. An experienced broadcaster herself and graduate of Queen's Arts '26, Mrs. Ryan has authorized two grants totalling approximately $35,000 to be made to CFRC before the end of this year to purchase urgently required FM equipment. Part of Mrs. Ryan's concern for CFRC stems from the fact that her late husband, also a Queen's graduate, was a student broadcaster at CFRC during its initial years of operation.

The Foundation will allow for donations from other contributors who wish to support the foundation's purpose.

Rector election due in Nov

Annette Nicholson

Next month Queen's students will be asked to elect a new rector. The election will coincide with a referendum which is expected to be held November 17-18, subject to Outer Council approval. The deadline for nominations, which must be validated by 200 signatures, is November 4. There have been no submissions to date, as the post has not yet been advertised.

The position is vacant because the last rector, Bruce Trotter, is now at Oxford. There have been three student rectors in the past: Alan Broadbent, Gary Ganase and Bruce Trotter. Previously the rector had been an eminent public figure, such as R.B. Bennett and O.D. Skelton. According to the AMS constitution the term is three years but no student has ever held the post longer than two years.

The rector must be a student when he is elected but need not remain a student for the duration of his term. His primary function is to sit on the Board of Trustees, which meets five or six times a year. The rector is the only student on the Board and acts as an ombudsman between students and the administration. He must be able to direct students with problems or grievances through the proper channels, and therefore should be familiar with the workings of the university and should stay in contact with the AMS, the Senate and the Faculty Societies.

It is considered an important and prestigious position. The role of the rector, however, has not been rigidly defined and therefore offers the scope for as much involvement as the rector himself deems necessary.

Queen's the quiet campus

In the wake of several faculty unionizations the Queen's faculty Association President Peter Bly commented that unionization reflects the "almost pathological lack of trust between faculty and administration at many universities."

Unions aren't needed here

by Tim Greenwood

Queen's Faculty Association President Peter Bly said in an interview that the unionization of faculty associations is symptomatic of our times and reflects the "almost pathological lack of trust" between faculty and administration at many universities.

Last year the Queen's Faculty Association decided the time had come to study and evaluate alternatives to the present method of bargaining with the administration and government over salary and related matters. A committee was appointed to study the situation and after a year of deliberation it produced a report in April of this year.

The Committee's findings and recommendations illuminated the health state of the relationship between faculty and administration at Queen's. The easy and amicable relations, with open dialogue between the two results, as Mr. Bly pointed out, from the administration thinking of themselves as faculty members, because they all teach. In view of this, the committee recommended that the Faculty Association continue its negotiations with the administration on a non-contractual basis as before. It suggested however, that the meetings should be better organized and prepared with minutes taken and a fixed agenda.

There have been two meetings of this newly formed joint council of faculty and administration to date. On May 1st there was an organizational meeting and last week the first working meeting took place, with all reports indicating it went well. Four representatives from each group met at these meetings, in what Mr. Bly called "an atmosphere of formal informality". In the process of making its recommendations, the faculty appointed committee rejected the alternative of unionization or adopting the Alberta Plan.

Unionization, or certification as it is properly called, was rejected for several reasons. It was felt that the establishment of two power centres with different interests would create a divisiveness within the university. Certification was further opposed for the cost in time and money it would take and because the committee believed it would lead to the creation of an unwieldy bureaucratic structure.

The Alberta Plan, so-called because it was implemented at the University of Alberta, provides for the entry of a third party arbitrator to settle contract disputes. This alternative was rejected because the committee could not project how it would operate in the Queen's environment.

Ultimately though, the rejection and recommendations can all be seen as a reflection of the faculty's satisfaction with the status quo. However Faculty Association President, Peter Bly, noted that the faculty position toward certification could change if the recommendations of a Senate report on faculty appointment were to be accepted unchanged. Mr. Bly felt that the writers of the report were "wielding a very blunt axe".

In a report written in response to the Senate statement, the Faculty Association stated that acceptance of the report and its recommendations would lead to a polarization of the Faculty and Administration. The Association believed this would result from "the implicit proposed replacement of several functions of Senate by Administrative discretion". The Association's harshest criticism fell on a section of the report regarding the release of tenured faculty for budgeting reasons. The Faculty Association felt that the recommendations of the report would not ensure that before a faculty member was dropped all other alternatives would be examined. They also strongly opposed releasing members on the basis of seniority suggesting that the dismissal be geared to have the least impact on the academic position of the faculty. The Senate has promised to reconsider its report and the final recommendations will come out next year.

Congratulations!

Our mining engineers collect 10 of 27 awards

The Canadian Mineral Industry Education Foundation recently presented 10 Queen's University mining engineering students with scholarships designed to attract "young men of high calibre to a career in the mining industry."

Dr. R.D. Lord, Director of the Mining Industry Research Organization of Canada said that recipients were judged on the basis of academic performance, summer employment experience and departmental recommendations.

Queen's student, Glen Dennis, was awarded a two-year scholarship valued at $12,600 to finance a Master's program in mining engineering. Nine undergraduates from second, third and fourth years in Queen's mining engineering department, received $1,500 scholarships for one year of study. They are: Ray Reipas, Robert Scott, Gordon Ball, Greg Carriere, Robert Dickhout, Glen Sine (Belleville), Dave Hodson, Tom Demorest (Marmora), and Brian Caldwell.

Mr. T.R. Rudnicki, secretary of the foundation, said that in 1976 the foundation awarded 24 undergraduate scholarships at seven Canadian universities. Queen's students won nine of the 24. At the post-graduate level three scholarships were given, a Queen's student took one of these awards.

Mr. Rudnicki said that the foundation represents 36 mining companies in Canada and endeavours through a scholarship program to persuade well-qualified engineering graduates to join the expanding mining industry.

Queen's Club Night

From the physical to the spiritual

There was something for everyone at Queen's Club Night, held last Thursday. A good turnout of students toured the floor and stage of Grant Hall, searching for the club or activity that might interest them among the close-to-forty represented.

Those who did not become inspired enough to join anything were probably well entertained by the displays of fencing, swirling Scottish dancing, and films of skydiving and wildwater kayaking. For the foot-weary and hungry there were also tea and cookies and a place to sit at the NDP table.

There was such a great variety of clubs and organizations that it is only possible to mention a few here. For those with a thirst for adventure there were several choices. The skydiving club, the scuba club, and the wildwater club were a few of them. Anyone who looked for their adventure in politics could join forces with the Young PCs or the NDP.

Calm and steely-nerved individuals could choose to join the archery, rifle or pistol clubs. If you liked the strategy of war but not the weapons, there was the non-violent War Games Club to challenge your mind.

People interested in the matters of the spirit could visit Transcendental Meditation, a relatively new religion - Bahai, and several Christian groups to decide among.

People wishing to lend a hand, or an ear, could join such volunteer organizations as TAK, Campus Outlook or the Circle K club.

Club Night concluded with a lot of satisfied and also some frustrated

Foreign students pay more

Tuition hiked 256%

by Phil Cheesman

On January 1, 1977, foreign students studying at Ontario universities will be paying 256 percent more for tuition.

Abdul Gafur, an OFS fieldworker, who was to speak at Queen's last week, sees no reason for the Ministry of Colleges and Universities to have drafted the policy of increased fees for students from abroad. "Clearly, the justification is just not there," he said during his visit to the campus, which was part of an awareness campaign concerning the fee hike.

According to the OFS representative, only 6 percent of the Ministry's budget will be saved by the new policy. Mr. Gafur seems quite upset at the government's decision to institute "differential fees."

"The advantages of not having differential fees are so overwhelming, that Ontario's argument cannot hold water," he said. Among other things that bother him is the fact that no public forum was ever held to discuss the issue. Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities, simply declared the policy.

Not only does the OFS question the "desirability to raise fees", but it also disagrees strongly with the magnitude of the increase. Foreign students in colleges are (as of September 1976) already paying 200 percent more than their Canadian colleagues. Their university counterparts are facing a 156 percent increase in tuition - from $585 to $1,500.

Students from outside Canada already have a very difficult task in raising the funds for the privilege of studying here. The Canadian dollar gains tremendous weight when compared to the currency of another nation, say from the Third World.

As an example, Mr. Gafur explained that "the Indian dollar is worth $2.25 in Canadian currency." Thus for every dollar a Canadian student raises towards his tuition, a student from India must raise two and a quarter times that much to study here. This is before the increase takes effect.

The current OFS campaign began during the summer, fell off slightly, and was stepped up three weeks ago. "I believe if a sufficiently strong and sustained campaign is conducted, it will force Mr. Parrot to withdraw his policy," Mr. Gafur said hopefully. "If not, it will certainly force the Minister to reduce the increase substantially."

As an alternative to Ontario's position, the OFS fieldworker feels a "reciprocal agreement" would work. This means that the province should only charge differential fees to foreign students whose homelands do likewise to Canadian students. "I people going home. Many satisfied that they'd found what they had wanted, but probably still frustrated that they did not have the time or money to do more!

think this is a realistic attitude", he said.

Mr. Gafur stated that there is no room for forceful confrontation with the government in the campaign against higher fees. The best action for the OFS to take is to use "the process of consultation, letters, meetings with delegations, courteous phone calls and so on. The consultative process should be fully explored and exhausted."

Only about 5 percent of students studying in Ontario are here with student visas; the rest are Canadians. The savings to the government are really minimal and will be to even greater proportions, says Mr. Gafur. He feels the policy makes little sense and would like to see it reconsidered.

New lib chief possible with investigation

Debra Sigler

According to a memorandum from the Chief Librarian, Mr. Derek Redmond, a Principal's Committee on Libraries has been set up to "advise the principle on the appointment of a Chief Librarian, effective July 1, 1977, and on the present direction, future development and organization of the Queen's University Library system."

The library system has not been reviewed since 1964 and according to Mr. Redmond's memorandum, the library now has some 1,250,000 volumes which will soon present a space problem. The Queen's libraries have been accepted for membership in the Association of Research Libraries, which Mr. Redmond sees as a mark of some stature. Since the library has expanded significantly in this time, Mr. Redmond felt "that an overall review of the library should take place within a reasonably short time."

The Committee's terms of reference are "indefinite," according to Paul Steep, Vice President Operations, and one of the committee members. Nothing in particular is being examined, nor are any specific changes being planned, he said. Moreover, the office of Vice Principal Love contends that the committee may not necessarily replace the present Chief Librarian, a reviewing of that post is merely being undertaken.

The Principal's Committee meets once a week to discuss confidentially the information and opinions they have gathered. According to Professor Tulchinski, a report may not be published, as the committee reports straight to Principal Watts. Vice Principal Love says that no formal plans have been made as to what form a report might take.

P.C. Column

by Bill Stevenson

It was a rough summer for Pierre Trudeau. August's Gallup Poll showed that 47 percent of Canadians would probably have supported Joe Clark's Progressive Conservatives in an election.

The Tories led the Liberals by 18 percentage points, with the New Democrats 12 points behind the Liberals. Trudeau's reaction to this turn of fortune against his party (after he returned from his vacation in the Adriatic with the Aga Khan - a prime example of the "restraint" the Prime Minister has been preaching) was to spend 1.2 million dollars of public money to tell Canadians what a fine job the Anti-Inflation Board has been doing.

September's Gallup Poll figures, coming after this advertising campaign and Trudeau's alleged "straight talk with Canadians" approach, showed that Canadians still favoured the Tories by almost a full 15 percentage points. If an election were held tomorrow, the Progressive Conservatives would probably win with a majority, even with a large bloc of Quebec Liberals returning to Parliament.

Unfortunately for the Tories the next general election is still two years off, and the "Grits" have always had remarkable recuperative powers, most recently shown in their 1974 win. The Tories must take care not to become over-confident, but right now everything looks good. In 1978 Joe Clark may become Canada's youngest Prime Minister ever, and the first P.C. to hold that office since 1963.

Just eight months ago, few Canadians had ever heard of Mr. Clark. Indeed, for a while, he was referred to by many as "Joe who?" Yet his fame has spread rapidly. Up to now he has done this by devoting himself to a low-key grass roots campaign throughout the country, and by adopting a modest, but visible, national profile. He is also managing to pull the seemingly always faction-ridden federal P.C.'s together, creating a unity that has not been seen in the Conservative Party in years. Though there have been some problems, (and there will be more before the next election) the Party, and the country, have a leader for the future.

Mr. Clark holds the key for Federal Tory party success in his hands. He is likely to try to guarantee this success in the future by continuing to campaign at the grassroots level, while building up his national profile with strong performances in the House of Commons. His forceful and excellent reply to last week's Speech from the Throne is an example of this approach.

The Tories have a real chance to form a government after the next Federal election. Prime Ministerial arrogance alleged scandal in the government, policies which limit freedom somewhat are all reasons for giving the Liberals a stern rebuke.

Joe Clark is one main reason for which the Tories should be supported. After an articulation of alternative policies by Mr. Clark, the Tories will be supported.

The Brockington Visitorship

by Paul Dalle-Molle

The Brockington Visitorship is one of Queen's greatest assets. It provides a rich opportunity for vitalizing the University. This becomes an even more important event when one realizes that the Kingston environment cannot possibly provide the wealth of cultural opportunities available to universities in urban areas. To be exposed to an exceptionally capable person for one week is a rare and necessary experience for those members of the Queen's community who are in the pursuit of a liberal education. Of course, there can be great benefit to both the University and the Visitor if the week's activities are a process of mutual enhancement and challenge, rather than one of mere exposure.

A word of thanks is due to those who have served on the Brockington Visitor Committee throughout the years. The list of Visitors is impressive, and the benefits derived from them are greatly appreciated. The men most recently invited have been remarkable people whom it has been an honour and privilege to designate. The Brockington Visitor Buckminster Fuller, Jacob Bronowski, Claude Ryan, and now John Kenneth Galbraith.

Dr. Bronowski died just before he was to have come to Queen's, and everyone should regret the void left by his passing. Bronowski made a fine reputation as a scientist; his wide acclaim, however, came as a result of his ability to explain science to a lay audience, to understand the proper role of science and technology in society, and to criticize the impersonal and abstract claims on technology by our industrial way of life.

Buckminster Fuller made his mark originally as an engineer and designer. The full authority of his presence arises from his devotion to unconventional thinking. Insight, humanism and boundless energy are the chief characteristics of this inspiring and refreshing man.

Claude Ryan is a highly respected journalist and editor of LE DEVOIR. The high standards of his work are unique in a profession where sensationalism and superficiality are often confused with quality. Ryan's work is designed to provide in-depth, wide-ranging information service, and to advocate the public interest through the printed media.

Professor Galbraith is an economist, author, diplomat, bureaucrat and teacher. His clarity of thought, his rigorous critical capacity, the accuracy of his analysis make him deserving of praise and admiration. When his intellectual capacities are combined with his wit, urbanity, and eloquence the result is overwhelming. Professor Galbraith, as well as being the most widely-read and influential critic of modern capitalist society, is the leading personality in the academic circles of North America.

It is distressing that Professor Galbraith has found it necessary to cancel four days of his scheduled five-day visit. He now becomes the Brockington Visitor in title only, and his visit is diluted to that of a special lecturer. The flavour and substance of the Brockington Visitorship is found in the Socratic dialogue, the dialectical process. During a five-day stay the prolonged exposure offers students the possibility of a cumulative learning experience. It also allows students and staff to explore the totality of the guest. This scheme is infinitely more valuable than any lecture or series of lectures could be, and it is the fundamental idea motivating the Brockington Visitorship.

Liberal Column

by Sheila Dunn

The national strike called for by the Canadian Labour Congress received a mixed reaction. Approximately half the CLC members participated actively in the strike. Work stoppages appeared more popular than participation in planned rallies.

As a means of protest, the strike and rally method seems anachronous for the 1970's. Sit-ins and rallies were the tools of radicals protesting Vietnam and the bomb in the 60's. The issues of this decade are more conservative and practical and thus solutions follow by means of discussion and consensus. Whether or not this is a good thing is not being debated.

Today, support for massive rallies is hard to encourage. Workers are concerned about maintaining jobs in a period of high unemployment. Every dollar counts these days. Therefore, it's not surprising that workers were reluctant to walk out on October 14 for a cause which couldn't guarantee any tangible results.

If the Canadian Labour Movement is considering a move toward political identification, they had best sit down and consider the limitations of such a move. Idealism is a burden today when trying to win solid public support.

The federal New Democratic Party has long been internally divided between ideological purists and pragmatists. The election of Ed Broadbent as leader clearly indicates that the pragmatists are presently dominating the party. The NDP wants to win seats. They have had to shift their views to the ideological right in order to capture more voters. Either the CLC or the NDP must amend their stands to accommodate each other if the NDP is to become the political spokesman for the Canadian Labour Movement.

A second strike has been suggested. When the decision to call this protest was made, repeats were not ruled out. However, the CLC would be naive indeed if they felt the performance on October 14 justifies a second strike. Pressure against the anti-inflation programme and calls for inclusion of labour in economic decision-making must be generated another way.

The formation of a new political party to represent labour exclusively might be a future possibility. Such a proposal, though, would need to be discussed at considerable length. Support must be consolidated and development of a recognizable and sufficiently balanced platform is necessary to attract a wide spectrum of voters.

It is interesting to speculate whether Canada's multiparty system can tolerate another participant. Political parties in Canada must accommodate as many interests as possible to justify their claim as a prospect for a national government. A labour party might have problems finding enough support across the country. It would also have to compete with strong NDP parties in the prairie provinces.

As I see it, one of the problems with the national strike was reliance on local unions to organize individual visible and effective protests. Though the Canadian Labour Congress voted in favour of the strike, this did not mean every union branch approved. Unions rely on solidarity but cannot guarantee it. Therefore, some protests were poorly organized or not held at all. Some workers saw October 14 merely as a day off work. Clearly, a strong sense of purpose by all the workers is necessary for the success of a national strike. This is where October 14 failed.

To conclude, October 14 was not a success but not a failure. The CLC's promotion insured some measure of protest but not what they expected.

National strikes are an outdated form of protest. The labour movement in Canada must move towards definite political activism if they wish to make a firm impact. Their isolation from hard-core politics necessarily limits their present impact.

Peripheral Visions — by David Gay, This is the law?

By now it is well known that Queen's has established a legal aid service in the city of Kingston. The organization is beneficial both to Queen's and the community because it provides law students with the opportunity to gain first hand legal experience while offering free legal advice to area residents. But many of the students currently involved in the program complain that their duties aren't very exciting. There is no chance for emotional involvement, no mystery witnesses, no startling new evidence, and certainly no last minute calls from the governor. Some of the more frustrated young lawyers are already planning to sue their television sets for fraudulent misrepresentation of the profession.

My friend Jason is a law student and works at the centre. He recently spent a day there which compounded the irritation accompanying his gradual acquaintance with legal practice. Where was the tension? Where was the drama? The day had been a tiring kaleidoscope of deeds and titles mercifully interspersed with the recovery of a stolen bowling ball and the preliminary hearing of a twelve-year-old cub scout charged with breach of trust and embezzlement in connection with the disappearance of 75c worth of returnable bottles. It was 6:00 and there was one person left in the waiting room. Jason was tempted to walk out as he showed the man in, wearily reaching for another application form.

"State your name and occupation, please," asked Jason.
"Adolf Hitler, presently unemployed," the man replied.
"Now, Mr. Hitler, what seems to be the trouble?"
"Some years ago I was responsible for the annihilation of half a race, the flagrant destruction of a continent, and the most ruthless carnage in all history. After the war I fled and was offered shelter in Victoria Hall. I have hidden there these many years. But I can no longer bear it, and I wish to face my accusers. I want you to defend me."

As Hitler spoke Jason flipped rapidly through the criminal code trying vainly to classify his client's crimes by section and sub-section. His head was spinning. So what if he was Hitler? Here was real action at last!
"Well Mr. Hitler, it looks like murder one for openers but I've got a line on that one already," said Jason, assuring Hitler that he would be ready to go to court by the end of the week.

The end of the week came and the eyes of the world were trained on the Frontenac county court house. Jason was nervous because his classmates were present, but he came armed with every tool available to the criminal lawyer.

The first charge was the rape of France and Jason decided to defend in the traditional manner. This meant casting aspersions on the moral reputation of France in order to prove that she was of a previously unchaste character. He argued that France had in fact invited the assault by leaving several geographical points of entrance exposed and undefended, and by snuggling up "close and tight" to Germany for as long as anyone who lived there could remember. Besides, many French citizens had repeatedly walked home from work near the German border, often in loose or suggestive clothing. He then invited the jury to recall that France offered little resistance to the assault, and the charge was dismissed.

The charge of genocide was much easier to defend. The prosecution called Sir Winston Churchill to the stand, where he proceeded to denounce Hitler's inhuman abominations in terms which barely masked his fury. Jason objected on the grounds that the witness was hostile. The objection was sustained and, after holding Churchill in contempt for calling the trial a mockery, the judge dismissed the charge by invoking the statute of limitations.

Jason enjoyed less success with the third charge, the provocation of the second world war. He attempted to play on the jury's sympathy by dressing Hitler in a neck brace and back support, claiming his client suffered a severe case of whiplash during an allied air raid. But the punch had gone out of that trick since Chappaquidick and Jason was forced to make a deal ("can't you see my client is scared?") with the prosecution. Hitler was entered guilty and received six months suspended sentence. Now he must report to a probation officer once a month and is allowed one night out per week at the YMCA. Finally, as befits the crime, his wages are to be garnished until he has successfully paid off the entire war debt (thirty billion dollars).

The case did more to boost the morale of Queen's legal aid than any TV show on or off the air. The service is now flooded with volunteers eager to prove themselves while still undergraduates (a perverse philosophy still lingers on this campus which says that age and glory are in inverse proportion.) Spirit has peaked in the faculty of law thanks to Jason's stunning victory (although experienced lawyers have described the case as "routine").

Meanwhile, Mr. Hitler is a Fuller brush salesman in the Kingston area. He is close to retirement and heavily in debt so please do not bother him unless you intend to buy.

Hold on, Howard!

Dear Editor:

Although Howard Smith does not purport to write for the Journal in his capacity as president of the Law Students' Society, he is known to many as the holder of that position. Therefore, having regard to some of the recent views expressed by Howard we feel that it is imperative that he be clearly indicated that he is advancing his personal opinions.

More serious is the fact that the views expressed in Howard's recent column on the protest against restraints were the views he expressed on the same subject at a recent AMS meeting. Howard's participation on the AMS is by virtue of his position as LSS President and he surely has some duty to represent his faculty. We have therefore proposed that in the future some mechanism be established by the LSS to ensure that Howard has made some effort to consult his faculty and to ascertain that he is advancing more than simply his personal opinion.

Yours sincerely,

The Women's Law Caucus

Towards optional Bus-it

Dear Editor:

If support for the BUS-IT program is withdrawn, a valuable service will be lost. This should present financial problems for the off-campus and west campus students who depend on the transit system for transportation. Those students fortunate enough to own cars will begin driving to school, thereby creating a parking problem on campus.

It has been argued that by eliminating BUS-IT, students will no longer be forced to pay for a service that serves a minority. The implications of such a statement are obvious. If indeed only a minority of students are involved with a program, then why not withdraw financial support? By applying this logic and dropping other fees from the list of compulsory activity fees, hundreds, perhaps thousands of dollars could be saved. Not everyone attends football games, concerts, or goes to the gym.

Rather than going to such extremes, a happy medium should be drawn. Perhaps BUS-IT support could be optional. If, during registration, BUS-IT cards were sold to those who wished to purchase them, other students would not be forced to pay for something that they don't use. The AMS could save money by withdrawing or decreasing its support. It may be argued that only a minority of students will buy such cards. If so, then the cost of the card would have to be raised. Yet, a price in the order of fifteen or twenty dollars still represents a saving to those who make frequent use of Kingston's transit service.

Do you want to dance

Dear Editor:

I've been a Queen's student for one month - and at the moment I'd love to remain a Queen's student for the rest of my life - but I've noticed a serious problem, which prompts this letter. I'd always believed that university social life was much more relaxed and uninhibited than that at the high school level, and I'd heard that at Queen's it was especially fantastic (counting for at least 60 percent of the university experience, according to a non-existent survey). But I'm extremely disappointed to note that it's just not so. I've been to most of the dances, pubs, concerts, and whatnot sponsored so far (being a "dumb" - but literate - artsie with only 18 hours of classes and 20 hours of reading-essays per week) and at each of the events I have noticed a marked sex aggregation. In spite of Women's Lib, Queen's gals still want to be asked to dance, drink, or "whatever" by the guys; Queen's men are therefore the source of our problem. I've noticed tables upon tables of the said "men" (?) at pubs and dances, just sitting there, apparently too scared or intimidated to even survey the possibilities. I'm tempted at one of the upcoming events to go up to one such coward and cry "boo!" just to watch him jump (being a coward myself I wouldn't have the nerve to goose him!) Guys, just because you ask a girl to dance doesn't mean you're committed for the rest of the evening. Don't be afraid to ask for just one dance and then leave. We're not going to bite you for it (at least, not on the first date). I'd really like to see a lot more interaction - and just plain friendliness - at these social events, so guys, I toss you this challenge to get off your butts and get moving. Let's see if we can't get Queen's social life an 80 percent rating in the over-all university experience.

Illiteracy: A last word

Dear Editor:

After reading time and time again about the so called "illiteracy problem" at our fair university, I have stumbled upon what I think would be an easy and at least partial solution to the problem.

Since the data was gathered from samples of final exam papers, the problem obviously lies in the structure of the aforementioned exams. A student who marches into these organized trauma sessions has only one goal in mind: to put down the information requested in the time allotted. "Damn the syntax, full steam ahead!" The stresses involved and the limited time gives a student two choices, either dash out the information in jumbled form in order to finish the exam or to take one's sweet time and complete 25 percent of the test in a reasonably intelligible manner.

Unfortunately, our profs do not feel that 1/4 of a well written exam is worth as much as 100 percent of an exam done in point form. Pity To judge the literacy standards of a university by such a yardstick only emphasizes among other things the lack of foresight on the part of the researcher.

If such a study is to be repeated, I suggest that the "victims" of this foul charade be informed that their geology tests will be used for such purposes and that an extra two hours be given so that they can rewrite their essays and correct any and all of the errors made in their haste

Sticking a ten page exam in front of a sweating student, giving him 2 hours and expecting to find a fine example of english prose is absurd

Using similar techniques I could prove statistically that 98 percent of all Queen's students are in a perpetual state of alcoholic stupor merely by standing outside of the entrance of the AMS pub on a Friday night and counting up the staggering bodies. For this I also expect a $6000 grant.

The most distressing aspect of the whole affair is that the press even gives this study any credence from a shoebox...

Credit unions - people motivated by concern

by Shelagh Hurley

The "office" of the new Copper Cliff Credit Union of 1937 was in Jake Gallagher's kitchen, Gallagher being the treasurer. Volunteers canvassed members on pay-day, collecting savings and loan payments. By the time they were finished, the banks would be closed, so the money lay in a shoebox under Jake's bed.

This way of handling funds was not unusual for credit unions of the 1930's. Most of the unions of that time had similar arrangements. Very little money was lost to thieves largely because thieves, as well as the general public, knew next to nothing about credit unions. (Paraphrased from "To the Credit of People", by Ron Kenyon).

The concept of credit unions is not a new one, however. Xenophon, of ancient Greece, and planned a banking society in which Athenians could subscribe capital and share in profits. In fourteenth-century England, Church funds were used for remedial loans to the poor. Credit unions established in the mid 1800's by Friedrich Raiffeisen are still in operation, and today there are over 10,500 Raiffeisen banks in Germany.

Alphonse Desjardins, motivated by a deep concern for the poor of Quebec, established a co-operative union. Desjardins wanted to make saving easy. He also wanted loans to be available at a rate the people could afford. So he got them to save together. The union depended entirely on the savings of members for capital. Thus, the members were dependent on each other, and they knew who to trust. The "Caisse Populaires" (People's Bank) flourished.

The prime factor in the formation of all credit unions is a concern for one's fellow man. The credit unions illustrate this concern through their method of operation, their services, and a totally democratic structure.

It is not difficult to form a credit union. Certain minimum requirements must be met, however. When applying for a charter from the government, 25 signatures must be presented, and the group of 25 signatures represent must have a potential membership of 300. The union is formed with a common bond of association, and serves only its members.

One credit union on the west coast of the U.S.A. consists of only members with the surname of "Lee". Apparently, it is quite a sizeable organization. Other bonds of association can include anything from civic employees to members of a particular band. The union must be large enough to adequately service all the members.

Each credit union is a limited company, and operates its own affairs, but almost all credit unions in Ontario are members of the Ontario Credit Union League. This league ensures that the policies of the unions are uniform throughout the province. The unions must co-operate with each other in order to compete with other financial institutions.

Credit unions are competitive. They offer banking services such as chequing-savings accounts. 85 percent of the members subscribe to a payroll deduction plan. This method of saving is successful because it is so easy. It is automatic, and one barely notices the deduction after a few paycheques.

Loans are perhaps the most attractive aspect of credit unions. The interest rates are by far the cheapest, generally 1 percent. Payment usually comes directly from deductions from paycheques. The interest is 1 percent simple interest per month on the unpaid balance of a declining balance.

The average cost of a bank loan is 13.5 percent on the total loan. The cost of a finance company loan is 24 percent on the total loan.

In order, however, not to give a totally distorted view of the loan situation, one can get more money, and get it faster, from either banks or finance companies. Also, it is good business to establish more than one line of credit. Banks are often supplementary financial institutions of credit union members.

A better deal on several things is not the only reason credit unions are an alternative to banking. The structure of the union itself is geared to each individual member. It is totally democratic. Each member of a credit union owns shares. Five dollars deposited, or "invested" in account equals one share. Every person, no matter how many shares he or she owns, is allotted one vote.

Thus, each year when officials such as board of governors or presidents are elected, the policy for all Ontario unions is decided on at a convention in Toronto, delegates elected from every union vote. In this way, majority rule of all the members prevails.

There are over 4,000 credit unions in Canada, owned by 7.5 million people. Each of these is a member, and each person has a vote.

The situation on charter banks is slightly different. All the charter banks of Canada, consisting of about 6,000 branches, are owned completely by the 185,000 people who have bought shares. Policy is decided by shareholders. The majority of the banking public does not hold shares.

Another type of difference arises between credit unions and banks. One invests in a union at five dollars a share, and these investments are savings. There is no risk involved in the investment. Depending on the profit of the union, shares yield a certain amount to owners. (Most of the profits of credit unions comes from interest paid by borrowing members). Dividends are calculated on each share the member owns.

This is not the same as the guaranteed annual interest paid on savings by banks. The yield on money deposited in credit unions depends solely on profits. Therefore, one is not quite sure how much money their savings will yield. When dealing with banks, one always knows the extra worth of their savings.

All the services and advantages of credit unions are offered to every members. Each member is considered an equal, be they student, affluent businessman, or single woman. There are no political or religious affiliations except in the common bond of association.

The fundamental philosophy behind credit unions is "I am my brother's keeper", whoever or whatever the "brother" may be. The evidence suggests that credit unions do believe in and work with this philosophy, and everyone benefits.

"like Howard Cosell"

Dylan - spokesman for a decade

by Kris Nowers

Bob Dylan is like Howard Cosell (sorry Bob); for the most it's either a love him or hate him relationship. For those who hate him there is little to be said. He plays poorly, his voice grates, and what's a "vision of Johanna"? However for those who love him it has become increasingly difficult to define his work and himself.

Throughout the sixties he was heralded as the leader of the protest movement. The songs "Blowin' in the Wind" and "The Times They are A Changin'" became virtual anthems to the sixties generation in America. Furthermore, his lyrics were more than just words fitted to chord changes. They were prophetic declarations of man with a telling perception of the times. The rich symbolism of his lyrics coupled with the harshness, even venom with which he performed gave clear indication of his conviction. He had a dual impact, upon his audience and upon his peers. Bands quickly perceived that if rock music was to become more than just an experiment in electricity, they would have to develop an articulate approach capable of exploring and touching human emotion.

Music is probably the most emotional form of communication and without doubt the emotional impact of music, no matter what form, is the yardstick by which one can judge its worth. Dylan gave to rock music the meaning and depth it had lacked for so long. Moreover he remains the premiere songwriter of today. Paul Simon, a man of considerable talent himself, said "Dylan is like the moon. He's got this weird effect on the tides. He does things and I see the ground shift."

It's apparent then, that Dylan was both a pioneering musician and a voice for the political and social activism of the sixties. Most separate lyric from note to examine Dylan's stature in American literature as a poet.

The political overtones of his songs and his influence upon rock were clearly obvious, but for the academics his poetic worth was questionable. While Dylan's lyrics were readily accepted by people like Allan Ginsberg, America's grandpa hippie, the hard-core literature pros were by and large skeptical. Unfortunately, I find that dry appraisal of Dylan's lyrics is a misguided exercise. One definition of poet is "one endowed with great imaginative, emotional or intuitive fervor and capable of expressing his conceptions, passions or intuitions in appropriate language." The key is, of course, to understand what the appropriate language of Bob Dylan is. His language is both music and words. His poetry is an assimilation of two modes of communication and examining his work in any other way than in the context of this assimilation is at the least unfair. No other person in the decade past so lucidly expressed the social revolution of the generation Dylan should be appreciated for this though I have a tendency to believe that in order to gain acceptance by the hard-core guys you've got to be dead for awhile. Whatever the case, his place in American literature has yet to be clearly acknowledged.

Today, Bob Dylan is a bit nebulous to many people. It's pretty hard for the complacent seventies to identify with the radical sixties. Consequently, people who are not atune to that era must have different conceptions of Dylan. It's also clear that Dylan has grown somewhat complacent too. No longer do you see the gaunt, drawn face of a hungry singer looking for a break in the big leagues. Bob Dylan is now establishment. He has a wife, five kids, a two million dollar mansion in California and a pretty chubby face. His past performance has made him as much an enigma as the Beatles. Where he was and is a musical Messiah to those who still relate to the sixties, he has been relegated to commercial superstar by those who can't. It's reflected in his music too. Much of his music today is of the "current events" type. "Hurricane" and "Joe" on his Desire album are choice examples. He really should get together with Crosby, Stills and Nash.

Even with all these categories there remains one more void for Bob Dylan to fill. Dylan, or should I say Robert Zimmerman, has been elevated by such Jewish writers as Stephen Pickering to the post of prophet for the Jewish race. As a listener of Dylan I can see an element of truth in his being a poet and musician but even

I'm skeptical of Pickering's views. In his book, Bob Dylan, Approximately, Pickering goes into a word by word dissection of Dylan's lyrics to make the reader aware that all Jews should be following Dylan to the Promised Land. It gets to the point of being mildly ludicrous.

After hashing all this over one gets around to the key question and the point of this article: What is Bob Dylan? For me he is best defined by the man he idolized during his early years. Woody Guthrie succinctly concluded that, "most people are singers of folk songs, Bob Dylan is a folk-singer." And isn't this the proper category for Dylan? He is a member of American folk-lore and the music that perseveres because it is a fundamental reflection of a country's heritage. "Well, I guess."

Prof names corridor "Main Street"

Quebec to Windsor

Growth, development, disappearing farmland

by Hugh Dodd

Maurice Yeates, head of Geography at Queen's, has written a book entitled Main Street: Windsor to Quebec City, describing a strip of land often referred to as an "axis" between the two cities containing over half of Canada's population.

Most Canadians wish to live in this 700 mile long, 125 mile wide axis. Population is increasing faster there than anywhere else in the country. As well, the inhabitants are generally wealthier. In 1971, three quarters of Canada's employment in manufacturing was found there.

Toronto and Montreal are the two large commercial centres exerting their influence on the area. Traffic flow between the two cities is greatest in the axis, and in Canada as well. Air, land and St. Lawrence Seaway links are extensively used.

To analyze and understand why urban growth has been so dominant in Southern Ontario and Quebec, one must look at the initial advantages granted the region. Historically, Montreal was a centre of the fur trade for New France. Eventually the focus shifted away from furs, and toward staples such as farm products and timber. Toronto became the important centre of activity.

Because these cities had excellent transportation and communications links, they were able to establish themselves and flourish. Initial advantage became a self-reinforcing capacity.

The financing, marketing and organization of a staple economy was coupled with a growth in manufacturing during the first half of the 20th century. "Because finance, transportation, market and industry were geared to Toronto and Montreal, these cities could accrue the resulting growth," says Dr. Yeates. "Consequently, our country now revolves around the Windsor-Quebec Axis."

Furthermore, "this economic activity will continue unless certain forces which have led to the concentration are altered." Dr. Yeates warns that growth rates in the major cities will likely exceed the capacity of housing or urban-land delivery systems. Costs of dwellings will become unreasonable, and transportation snarls will develop.

Even now, "land and housing prices are very high in the Oshawa-to-St. Catherine's area", according to Dr. Yeates. To solve this problem, Dr. Yeates suggests there should be an extension of the system of urban land banking, getting the land out of the hands of speculators. To control prices, municipalities should own the land, and also have expertise in planning how the land should be allocated.

For free-enterprise, land banking does have an insidious nature about it, because it means government intervention in the marketplace. However, there are certain areas where agricultural land is of high quality and the climate is good, but the land is in short supply. There are few places where this problem is more acute than in the Windsor-

Quebec corridor. The Niagara Peninsula Fruitbelt is an exception however, where developmental interests are in constant conflict with those who wish to preserve farmland.

Dr. Yeates points out that Canada, at the moment, has enough good quality agricultural land to produce fruits and vegetables for 15,000,000 people. Yet our present population is about 22,000,000 people. By the year 2001, our population could be up to 31 million. Therefore, only about one half of our needs will be met, if production continues on the present level. Naturally, if we decrease the amount of land available for agriculture, our food production will decrease as well. That is a preposterous situation for a country which is as sparsely populated, yet as large in area as ours.

The fresh fruits which originate from the Niagara Fruitbelt may instead have to originate from the United States and Mexico.

Management and control of the rate of urban growth in the axis is one way to reduce the pressure on farmland. The economic forces that brought about growth to the area must be analyzed, and then shifted to other parts of the country through decentralization.

Any attempts to relocate the growth-generating forces have historically concentrated on the manufacturing sector. However, Dr. Yeates suggests that these shifts have proved to be too costly and too limited in scope.

Consequently, the focus should shift to the government sector. For example, the Ontario government could allow certain cities a healthy distance away from the Toronto region to become growth centres. Various public administration departments could be shifted to these new centres.

However, Dr. Yeates cautions that decentralization must be carefully executed. "We can't ruin the dynamism that makes our big cities so vital," he states. Growth must be managed so it may have the best services provided. The best farmland must be preserved solely for farming and land and housing prices must be kept reasonable.

Main Street, which is written in both English and French language editions, was commissioned by Barney Danson, minister of Urban Affairs. In the foreword of the book, Danson states:

"...We must all question the extent to which (the Axis) should continue to grow and the extent to which it should be allowed to become dominant in terms of its concentration of people and economic activity..."

As the Financial Post, December 6, 1975 points out: "All evidence points to the axis becoming over-populated, an expensive place in which to live, a drain in terms of personnel from the rest of Canada, and a difficult place to administer. When we land in the middle of all these problems, we won't be able to say they came upon us unexpectedly."

Main Street gave us the warning.

George Carlin

mixed bag in more ways than one by Shelagh Hurley, photos by fud

"Have you ever had a piece of meat caught between your teeth...and when you finally get it out, do you chew it?"

George Carlin is a master of making us laugh at ourselves. We laugh because we know exactly what he is talking about. When Carlin describes commonplace things in his own particular way, all over the audience heads are nodding and people are nudging each other, murmuring "yah, really!"

That's the way it was for some on Saturday night. Carlin was amusing and easy to relate to. I spent a great deal of that hour and three-quarters smiling. I did not spend the hour and three-quarters laughing uproariously, and neither did a large portion of the audience.

There was something wrong with Carlin's performance. People should not have to pay $5.50 to sit in uncomfortable seats and just smile. If Carlin was tired from travelling to the Jock Hart arena, he appeared totally fatigued towards the end of the evening, and his performance suffered.

His revision of the seven words you can't say on T.V. (or print in the Queen's Journal) lacked the atmosphere of fun that usually surrounds his topics. I don't quibble with his deletion, but his addition of 'turd' to the list is absurd. I can say that to my mother!

Another fault was the frequent pause to guzzle beer. I am aware of the fact that Carlin is a 'casual' professional, but his drinking annoyed me. He should have taken his break, which he needed, and quaffed a few then. His request for another Heineken was painfully awkward. The request and the drinking were unprofessional, and interrupted the rhythm of the show. Carlin took advantage of the good nature of the audience.

Carlin was adequate; some bits were superb, but I got the general impression that he wasn't enjoying himself. The majority of his performance was original but his delivery was below par. His audience is more than willing to listen to him and with a trust such as that he should give them their money's worth. He didn't.

Monet and Seurat Thursday

Impressionist art films

If you like the Impressionists you'll love these films. I don't know what magic Sir Kenneth Clark has but he can always seem to make the artist's personality come alive. He is as great as the men he discusses. He makes a lot of people want to run out and sign up for the B.A.T. Ed. program.

The two films will be shown on Thursday twice. Once starting at 12:15pm and then again at 7:00pm. They are FREE at Agnes Etherington which is the building on the corner across from the Grant Hall clock tower. If you are a little late because of a class change, just tiptoe. Each film is 40 minutes long. The Monet is first.

It's hard to say why the Impressionists are so great. A lot of it is being at the right place at the right time and a lot of it is being a genius. The whole history of art is just a series of actions and reactions and the period preceding the Impressionists was becoming so established and institutionalized that creativity and individuality were being buried. Impressionists like Monet, who are dynamic and bold, went against the traditional idealistic style and painted Paris as if it was a bowl of cherries, gay, exciting and colourful. The Post-Impressionists didn't take this outlook on life. They were very critical of Paris. Seurat was a Neo-Impressionist, you have probably seen one of these paintings which are a series of images formed by dots of colour (called pointilism). The Impressionists were great because of what they started and because of the expressional genius that they showed.

Pianist and Queen's professor Dr. Elaine Keillor will appear in recital at Dunning Hall tomorrow evening

Recital this week

The first of the current season's musical events presented by the Music Department at Queen's University will take place on Wednesday, October 20 at 8:30 pm in Dunning Auditorium, when Elaine Keillor, who has recently joined the Music Department, will give a piano recital for which there is no admission charge.

The varied program of 18th, 19th and early 20th century music which Dr. Keillor will play demands the highest degree of technical virtuosity and musical sensitivity from the pianist. Works by Haydn, Beethoven, Chopin, Scriabin, Brahms and Debussy constitute the program.

Elaine Keillor made her first public appearance as a pianist at the age of 2½ years and continued to develop as a brilliant student of piano at the Royal Conservatory of Music from where she received her ARCT before her eleventh birthday. She went on to win many medals and awards, and at age 19 won the Cappell medal, awarded to the outstanding young pianist in the British Commonwealth. In 1960, as winner of a cross-Canada tour sponsored by the Canadian Federation of Music Teachers Association, she performed a concert in Kingston at St. Andrews United Church under the auspices of the Ontario Registered Music Teachers' Association.

Dr. Keillor's concert career has taken her across Canada and to Great Britain, Europe, the Soviet Union and the U.S.A. She has appeared in solo recitals, in orchestral performances with major symphonies in Canada and with smaller chamber ensembles, and on the CBC and NBC radio and television networks.

In addition to her career as a concert pianist, Dr. Keillor holds a B.A. degree (Honours in Music from both York University and the University of Toronto); an M.A. (Musicology) and a Ph.D. (Musicology), both from the University of Toronto.

On the Job at the Grand Theatre

Entertaining, slick, and a little dead

Donald Rayko

David Calderisi's Centaur Theatre Company production of David Fennario's On the Job is unquestionably one of the finest pieces of theatre seen in Kingston in a very long time. In performances at the Grand last weekend, members demonstrated that they are a competent, professional company. That's given. That they remember their lines, that they establish credible characterizations, that they do not make unintentional asses of themselves on stage, these are all axiomatic. We can address critical consideration to the substance of the production, not merely to the avoidance of errors. And that's a welcome change.

A foreman, an old man, and three Pointe St. Charles punks are the shipping-room employees in a Montreal shmata factory. The taking away of a Christmas Eve half-day holiday serves as distillate and focal point of their powerlessness, frustration and oppression. In their ineffectual, inarticulate way, they stand and speak out for all the losers born at the bottom of the capitalistic heap, their labour and their lives to be squeezed out of them, like juice from grapes in a press, and then discarded.

Performances by the entire cast were sparkling: crisp, controlled and convincing, their act was very much together. It was that energy that carried the play and me through ninety engaging minutes. Dissatisfaction began only after the final curtain.

The reason that On the Job doesn't ultimately work is that deep down, under the neat and polished production, the play is dead. A corpse.

It is as if David Fennario had set himself an exercise: to write a play of working class frustration, despair and futility, the garment factory as microcosm, an allegory of oppression.

And the exercise is performed brilliantly—the witty bits are witty, the pathetic bits pathetic, the protagonists sympathetic, and the antagonists despicable. But underneath it all, the play is lifeless. It feels like a pose. Well intentioned, no doubt—but still a pose.

It is too pat, too predictable. A brainless top of a factory owner, the kind with the bland, uncomprehending smile of a guy who always starts out with hotels on Boardwalk and Park Place in the Monopoly Game of Life. A mean bastard of a factory manager. A venal, gelded union rep. Four dead-end working stiffs. And a sympathetic workingclass foreman, who played by the rules, got his reward, and now has to take shit from both sides.

Fennario's intent is obviously to grab your guts, squeeze them and bruise them with outrage and despair, and then to hand them back to you at the end of the play, knotted and bloodied—for you to try to put back together again, on your own. If you can.

The recipe has been followed impeccably, but it remains a recipe.

It is tired. Though the ingredients are of the highest quality, the aftertaste is flat.

Don't get me wrong. In terms of technique and intent, it was still one of the most commendable things this town has seen, it was still a very enjoyable evening. But it weren't no gut-bruiser.

(Edgar) Alan Parsons Evermore

by Sandy Graham

Remember those great old leather-bound books you used to find at your grandmother's house? Those classic volumes with the rough-cut pages and the sheets of tissue protecting each "photographic plate"? Of course you do, for who can ever forget dear grandma's library? I suppose, therefore, that we can all thank Alan Parsons' grandmother for instilling in him a respect for literature.

A distinguished record producer, Parsons has assembled over two hundred musicians and singers to perform a musical interpretation of the works of that master of intrigue, Edgar Allan Poe. Collectively titled the Alan Parsons Project, they have all contributed to an exciting album Tales of Mystery and Imagination. Delightfully it comes complete with tissue sheets sandwiching the attached lyric booklet.

While one should never judge a record by its cover, I've learned to expect nothing but the best from Alan Parsons. His may not be a household name but if you look you'll probably find it on a good many of your record albums. And has Parsons is considered one of Britain's best engineer-producers, and has worked for Pilot, the Hollies and the Beatles (on the Abbey Road album) among others. He is praised for having engineered Pink Floyd's epic concept album, Dark Side of the Moon.

Mystery and Imagination is Parsons' first attempt to work from both sides of the studio console, that is, produce as well as compose and perform. Through previous albums he was merely realizing other people's ideas, but Tales affords him an opportunity to totally express himself. This he does by putting the best talents in the music business to work for him, the great majority of them performers he has worked for before (although he does handle some guitar and keyboard work and a few minor vocals). This ensures a consistently excellent standard of musical competence.

Most of the material was co-authored with Eric Woolfson, the executive producer, and the one who actually introduced Parsons to Poe. The Woolfson-Parsons team has written six strong and varied selections, each a gem cut from Poe's solid themes, but polished and refined so that it cannot fail to dazzle.

The seventh selection on the album, a gorgeous fifteen-minute instrumental entitled, "The Fall of the House of Usher" is the most noticeable contribution from the project's third driving force, Andrew Powell. A classically trained musician, Powell uses his music to illuminate the elegance which Poe tried to establish in writing about the honourable history of the distinguished Usher family.

Weird minor keys and subtle background attempts at melody from the oboe and lower woodwinds suggest the "insufferable gloom" which surrounded the dilapidated family mansion in Poe's description. The faded glories of the ballroom are recaptured in the fleeting strains of a waltz, but a deep bass clarinet solo ends any thought of happiness. It seems as if a once beautiful flute or clarinet solo has been transposed for this gloomy bass clarinet, giving one the impression of great melancholy. Terror is heightened as screaming strings hold sustained notes over a solid bass pattern and lose themselves in a heart-stopping thunderburst. Parsons' skill as an engineer is evident here as he splices his thunderstorm into the rhythm and mood of the next movement. So effective is the rainfall that one must resist getting up to look out the window every time one hears it.

The album's best song is "The Tell-Tale Heart" a powerful, hard-rocking number that leaves you breathless. Over a dirty, pounding bass and guitar, Arthur Brown belts out an extraordinary vocal laden with both contempt and fear. His desperate screams and shrieks are very frightening and realistic, and as he sings the words, "You should have seen my eyes grow white and cold with fear", you can hear his voice falter in shock. Never listen to this one in the dark!

Other selections such as "The Cask of Amontillado" and "To One in Paradise" are beautifully melodious melodies, featuring first-rate vocal harmonizing. "The Raven" opens with a quiet electronic voice which suddenly shifts from left to centre channel, as the author is surprised by the great ebony bird. This album is so full of marvellous techniques that one could not possibly appreciate them all without re-reading Poe's classics first.

The Douglas Library features an extensive selection of his work. Who knows? You too may become a Poe fiend. Years from now your grandchildren will pull out "Tales of Mystery and Imagination" by The Alan Parsons Project and marvel at the graphics and the tissue sheets—to say nothing of the music.

Queen's keeps on trackin'

Track & field 2nd in Ontario

by Alison Mitchell
Despite the cold temperature and the cloudy skies in Hamilton, the Queen's Track and Field Team finished second overall, in both the OUAA and OAIAA championships this weekend.

In the first race of the day, Mike DeGuda and Max Barr finished fourth and fifth in the 10,000 metres. In the 800 metres, Jeff Giles covered his personal best time, by 1.3 seconds to finish third with a time of 1:55.9. Congratulations also to "Jeffrey" Walt Sepic, who finished fifth in the same race with a time of 1:57.3.

In the sprint events, Duncan Card "cleaned-up," coming first and tying the OUAA records in both the 100 metres and 200 metres. His times were 10.7 and 21.6 respectively. Tim Page also tied the OUAA record in the 100 metres and the 200 metre, Page was third in 21.9 seconds, and Vic Gooding was fourth with 22.2 seconds.

"Chocolate Quik" Gooding set a new Queen's record in the 400 metre race, running the distance in 49.6 seconds for 2nd place. Tony Verhoeven wasn't far behind, placing third in 50.0 seconds. A rookie to the Queen's team, Charlie Hitchen, finished fourth in a time of 51.1 seconds.

In the hurdle events, Marc Macaulay and Don Price proved that Queen's is still a powerhouse. Marc was first in the 400 metre hurdles in a time of 54.3 seconds, and Don Price was third in a time of 54.3 seconds. In the 110-metre hurdles, Marc again led the way for the Queen's men, placing second in a time of 15.6 seconds. Don Price was third in 15.9 seconds, and Jim Morrison was fourth in 16.5 seconds.

In the 1500 metres, Bob McCormack ran to a first-place finish in a time of 3:59.3 seconds. Claus Rinne placed second in the 5,000 metres with a time of 14:50.4. Roger Wheate managed to place fifth in the race (15:46.6 seconds).

The men's relay teams showed their strength, coming in with two place finishes. The 4 X 100 team of Wilson, Page, Gooding and Card outclassed the other teams in a time of 42.9 seconds. In the 4 X 400, it was Macaulay, Hitchen, Page and Verhoeven who ran the race in 3:19.3.

In the men's field events, Peter Becke placed fourth in the long jump (6.12 metres) and third in the triple jump (13.61 metres). In the discus, Tony Verhoeven was ninth with a heave of 38.10 metres. Verhoeven was also second in the javelin with a toss of 65.78 metres. John Booth was fifth in the javelin and fifth in the pole vault. In the high jump, Malcolm West was fifth with a leap of 1.90 metres, tying the Queen's record, and Mike Forsayeth was sixth with 1.85 metres.

The women's team had many fine performances from all the members. Jan Pipe was fifth in the 200 in a time of 26.8 seconds. Kathy Cook was seventh in the same race with a time of 29.8 seconds. Miss Pipe was also fifth in the 400 metres in a time of 62.7 seconds. Sue Spence was fourth in the 800 metres, finishing in a time of 2:17.9 seconds. Miss Spence was also third in the 1500 metres race, turning in a time of 4:53.2. Sue Plummer was fourth in the same race and Lee Ann Poland was fifth. Their respective times were 5:24.8 and 5:29.0. Anne MacMillan had a time of 11:24.2, good enough for third place in the 3,000 metres. Beth Buckingham was fifth in a time of 11:46.0 in the same event. Laurin MacWilliam finished third in the 400 metres hurdles (73.0) and Jean Dietrich was fifth in the 100 metre hurdles (17.4). Miss MacWilliam managed a sixth place in the 100 metre hurdles. Jean Dietrich was also third in the high jump, leaping 1.55 metres. Pam Scothorn was first in the shotput, with a heave of 11.27 metres. Karen Rahn was fourth with a throw of 9.71 metres. Miss Scothorn was second in the javelin with a distance of 35.82 metres. Miss Rahn was third in the discus with a toss of 33.51 metres. Denise Tobin was fifth in the same event.

The girls 4 X 100 relay team of Barb Burton, Lynn Souter, Kathy Cook and Jan Pipe set a new Queen's record, as they finished third in 51.5 seconds. The 4 X 400 team of Jan Pipe, Sue Plummer, Laurin MacWilliam and Sue Spence managed a fourth place finish and a time of 4:19.2 seconds.

After such a successful outdoor season, the Queen's Track Team is looking forward to an interesting and hopefully successful indoor season starting in January. So, Queen's Team, smile and keep on Trackin'!

A reminder to all team members: The Runathon is on Wednesday, October 20th at 5:30. Be There!!

X-Country takes title

The Cross-Country Gaels literally ran away with the Junior Team Title at the Ontario Track and Field Championships, held last Sunday in Woodbridge, Ontario. The ease of the victory surprised everyone except Coach Walter Eadie, who looked on with satisfaction as the team racked up a mere 13 points, half that of their nearest rivals, the University of Toronto Track Club.

The team attack was led by Captain Amad Shoemaker and Clause Rinne (dubbed the "shoebeam combination"), who finished numbers two and three in the 8,000 metre race, hot on the tail of arch-rival, Paul Williams of Toronto. Williams finished the hilly course in a time of 27:37. Shoemaker crossed the line just one second late and Rinne was a mere 7 seconds farther back.

But the key to the victory lay with rookie, Brian Stagg, who came up with a super performance, placing eighth in the race (in 28:57) and assuring the title for Queen's. The Gaels' two other junior-age (under 20 years) competitors, Dale Friesen and Paul Tinari, finished 19th and 24th respectively in the field of 41 runners.

Our sole senior-age runner, Roger Wheate, battled the gruelling 12,000 metre course (which included two water crossings) to finish a very respectable 27th in the field of sixty-plus athletes.

The victory was especially sweet for Shoemaker and Rinne for they, by virtue of finishing in the top six of their race, gained automatic selection to the team representing Ontario in the National Cross-Country Finals, to be held in Halifax, on November 20th. It was equally sweet for Coach Eadie, who continued his unbroken streak of award acceptances on behalf of his runners, collecting a full seven plaques at once!

So Pleased was he with the results that he commented "Now, bring on Villanova!", in anticipation of the team's trip to Pennsylvania next weekend for the Lehigh University invitational.

Gross leads U of T win

George Gross Jr. scored 19 goals to lead the University of Toronto to a three game sweep in the OUAA Eastern Division water polo tournament at York University on Saturday. Gross scored seven goals in U of T's 11-2 win over York, seven again in the game versus RMC, which U of T won 16-4, and five goals in a 9-4 victory over Queen's.

Queen's finished second with two wins and York third by beating the winless RMC.

Rugby undefeated

Queen's old and new get together and go high

The weekend past, was one of rest and relaxation for the Queen's Rugby teams. The Saturday encounter, in the O.U.A.A. league play against Brock University was cancelled and conceded when Brock failed to field a team. Fortunately the weekend was not lost entirely as two games for Sunday were planned.

Queen's 1st fifteen hosted a homecoming game when the Queen's "Old Boys" returned to the fields of Kingston. For many it was the first time in over five years. In a physical but friendly game the Gaels managed to defeat their predecessors in a game which matched the talent and experience of the Old Timers with the fitness and team play of the Gaels. Bill Buchanan scored the only try of the game, to give the 1st lead at half time. Queen's Gord Nixon kicked two penalties while Ron Eastale counted for the oldboys only three points, with a drop-goal. The final score was Queens 10, Oldboys 3

Queen's second team did battle against Trent University's 1st team winning 16-8 in the game that followed. Tries were scored by Tim Price, Don McLean, and Alun Williams. Alun Williams also did the kicking for Queens.

Next Saturday marks the rematch of last year's finalists when Queen's hosts York University. Last year York edged Queen's out of the final 14-9 at York, for the O.U.A.A. championship. It will be the last home game for the Gaels this regular season, and will be an important one as right now the two teams are tied for first place with Toronto, and Waterloo.

Tonight Queen's in an exhibition match will play Sandhurst Military Academy which is touring from Britain. Game time is 5:00 p.m. at West Campus.

Soccer settles for tie

by Gary Harvey

On Saturday the Queen's soccer team had to settle for a 1-1 tie against the host University of Western Ontario Mustangs. The draw was somewhat unsatisfying for the Gaels, who should have won but nearly ended up losing late in the second half.

Cold temperatures prevailed during the Western homecoming weekend, and this resulted in injuries to several players on both sides. The field was very large and in excellent condition.

The Gaels got off to their normal slow start, but gradually started taking control of the game and probably played one of their best halves of soccer this year. Ross Ealey and Brian Saunders both played excellent games in the absence of starters Gord Taylor and Tom Becke.

Pete Hill gave the Gaels a 1-0 lead in the first half, as he picked up his second goal of the year on a hard left-footed shot. Queen's came close on several other occasions, particularly a volley by Andy Goodman which the

Western keeper just got a hand on

The start of the second half also belonged to the Gaels who seemed destined to pick up this much-needed win. The tables turned, however, when rookie Andy Goodman was ejected from the game for questioning the referee's call. The official completely ignored the usual preliminary caution and Queen's was forced to play the last twenty-five minutes short-handed.

Goalkeeper Carl Saunders played well under a good deal of pressure, but was finally beaten on a sharp angle-shot by Western's star forward. Another blow for the Gaels came when Mark Bennet injured his knee after playing a strong game at midfield. Coach Don Baragar came off the bench to fill in for him. Saunders had his revenge shortly after, when he stopped a penalty shot by the same Western player who had scored on him earlier, to preserve the tie for the Gaels.

On Wednesday, Queen's travels to R.M.C. for a 4:30 game, and that should be a victory.

Queen's busiest sport

by Alex Faseruk

Every year the incoming Frosh must surely look forward to the end of Orientation Week feeling that perhaps they can finally escape the long and frustrating experience of joining yet another line in order to experience something at this great educational centre. Every year there are some upper year students (i.e. veterans) who know what a gruesome campaign lies ahead of them if they desire any type of social life. One way of spotting a rookie (i.e. frosh) is to observe that he is not used to standing in the same place for long periods of time doing nothing but waiting to get into something or waiting for something to go on sale. Some veterans are getting so good at it that the O.U.A.A. and the O.W.I.A.A. are on the verge of making it an officially recognized sport. Queen's people would surely sweep every and all competition.

Some hint of the growth and the increase in popularity of this sport this year was provided early in the term with the opening of the new pub in the John Deutsch Centre. Astronomically long lineups were the order of the day. Many remarked, only half in jest, that they would like to see the inside of the new pub sometime before they graduated.

Homecoming and Suzie-Q semi-formal ticket buyers always seemed to form long lineups, usually beginning many hours before these items actually went on sale. Sometimes these ventures are accompanied by the sister sport of camping out in order to assure the purchase of a ticket. For this year's Science Formal, twenty-three people decided to brave the elements and camp out so that they could get a ticket to Asgard. The sport of camping out in some ways demonstrates utter frustration - or perhaps it reflects that a person is "truly in love".

Another less quoted reason is that the "lineuppee", as a consequence of his patience, may receive his "ultimate reward". The art of gaining this reward is, of course, another great Queen's sport, but if an elaboration took place here, it would only be a regurgitation of the material which appears weekly in the Engineer's Rag, or the Golden Words, as it is sometimes called. This brings up another great Queen's sport of inter-Faculty rivalry.

But, let us now return to the merry world of waiting in line. By now most people have come to the conclusion that waiting in line reflects only another perversion of how people will go through great exhaustive lengths in the pursuit of fun. But sometimes the sport of line waiting is employed for the necessities around Queen's. One example of this was already provided when people registered so that they might walk down these hallowed halls. Another example was provided on September 30 when everyone was lining up in a mad frantic rush to pay their tuition. The last and perhaps most frightening example should come the day that the applications to get back into residence are distributed.

You do not believe me, frosh? On a cold February morning last year many girls did many Oil Thigh's throughout the early hours of the morning in order to keep warm so that they could receive one of the precious applications early.

The above three examples are performed most diligently by the conscientious student who realizes that he must survive around here. These people should, therefore, be labelled professionals since they perform only to survive. The people who wait in line for semi-formal ticket after semi-formal ticket or to get into the pub should be labelled amateurs in the true sense of the word since they seem to be doing it more for the love of the sport.

The onus should now be turned to the frosh so that they can now learn the finer points of line waiting. Two basic rules apply. The first is to know for sure when tickets to any important event are going on sale or when the doors open for that event. Secondly, show up early to be sure you get in. In order to test how effective you have become, try to get into the Dunning Movie tonight.

Next year someone should recommend to the Orientation Committee that a more comprehensive list of suggestions be published on how to attack lines at Queen's. I wish you good luck in your line-waits but I hope that some of you opt out from Queen's greatest passtime so I can get some sleep and save my energy for the events.

Richardson resigns

James Richardson, Minister for Defence, resigned his post in the federal cabinet on Wednesday to protest a proposal for bringing the British North America Act to Canada that would guarantee French language and culture rights. Mr. Richardson stated he resigned to "obtain freedom to speak openly and publicly without the restraints imposed by my position in the cabinet."

Mr. Richardson fears that constitutional guarantees along with a plan for constitutional amendment giving veto power to Quebec would commit Canada irrevocably to a linguistic straight jacket. He claims that the bilingualism policy is not working and Canada should not commit itself until it is proven that bilingualism can work.

Mr. Richardson states he was not opposed to the Official Languages Act which is similar to the section he was objecting to in the constitution, because it can be changed by an act of Parliament. He plans to remain in Parliament as a Liberal unless he is expelled from the Liberal caucus. Mr. Richardson also plans to travel around the country presenting his case to the people.

CLC Day of Protest

More than one million people joined in Canada's first national strike last Thursday. Leaders of the Canadian Labor Congress, which called for the day of protest, were generally pleased with the work stoppages across the country. However, the organized demonstrations in some cities, including Toronto and Ottawa, were disappointing with a poor turnout. The best support for the day of protest was in northern mining communities and some southern industrial cities. The demonstration had little effect on the general public since public transport and mail service were disrupted in only a few cities.

The effect of the walkout on Trudeau and the government will not be apparent for a while. The project was to prod the government into loosening controls and giving the trade unions a voice in economic decision-making and planning. Now that the strike is over the CLC will resume its discussions with the Prime Minister on these topics. However, Trudeau appears firm on his stand to keep controls in effect until the end of 1978 and it seems that little will be accomplished by the talks.

Watergate scandal

President Gerald Ford has been accused by former White House Counsel John Dean of stopping a proposed 1972 investigation into the Watergate break-in. The charge led some members of Congress to ask for a probe by the Watergate Special Prosecutor. Mr. Ford stated that he had no recollection of any contact with Mr. Nixon on a proposed inquiry by the House Banking Committee.

Charles Ruff, the Special Prosecutor, has made no immediate comment although Mr. Conyers, the Democratic representative for Michigan, said his request for a probe was being considered.

Mr. Dean attributed his information to Richard Cook, who was in the White House at the same time as Mr. Dean. Mr. Cook, however, described Mr. Dean's allegations as distortions and lies.

Nobel Prizes

A few of the 1976 Nobel Prizes were awarded last week for contributions to medicine and economics. Two American doctors, Dr. Baruch Blumberg and Dr. Carleton Gajdusek, received notice of the award in Medicine for their studies on the origin and spread of infectious diseases. Dr. Blumberg studied hepatitis and devised methods of detecting the disease in potential blood donors. Dr. Gajdusek investigated a rare form of brain disease in New Guinea that is transmitted by eating the brain of an infected person. A third American, Milton Friedman, also receives a prize in economics for his studies on the role of money in inflation and on monetary policy.

The recipients of prizes in physics and chemistry will be announced sometime this week. The prize for peace will not be awarded at all this year, with the $160,000 prize money being reserved until next year or returned to the general fund.

Mexican President Luis Echeverria and Roman Catholic nun Mother Theresa were two of the fifty nominees for the prize. The Nobel Peace Prize is to go to people who have worked for the "brotherhood between nations, for the dissolution or reduction of standing armies, or for organizing or promoting peace conferences."

Castro vs the US

Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba called off the anti-hijacking agreement with the United States yesterday, claiming the Central Intelligence Agency had caused the crash of a Cuban airliner off Barbados which resulted in the death of 73 people. Castro expressed willingness to discuss the agreement with whatever government was elected next month, but added that it must be on the basis of the end to all hostile acts against Cuba.

Similar agreements between Cuba and Canada and Colombia are not affected and the agreement between the U.S. and Cuba will remain in effect until April 15 due to a six-months-notice clause. The U.S. State Department denied any responsibility for the crash and said Cuba would be held strictly responsible for any hijacking resulting from Cuba's action.

Rhodesian Aid

External Affairs Minister Donald Jamieson stated Canada would be sympathetic to any request for money to help the development of Rhodesia under majority black rule.

The comment came after a three hour conference with United States Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. Other topics covered were the 200 mile off-shore limit, proliferation of nuclear weapons, energy, U.S. quotas on Canadian exports, and the dispute over the wiring of Canadian commercials on U.S. stations by Canadian cable T.V. companies.

Commenting on white Rhodesians wanting to emigrate to Canada, Mr. Jamieson said there was no special policy and that they would be dealt with in the normal fashion when they apply. He also pointed out that as yet there has been no increase in the number of Rhodesians wanting to emigrate to Canada.

Mayor Speal

Kingston Mayor Speal has decided not to run in the coming elections for mayor. He has spent seven years as alderman and four years as mayor. He now feels he should give more time to his law practice and to his family. He is held to be the best Kingston mayor since a long time. His years in office have given Kingston a new ferry dock and railway station, an enlargement to the airport, renovations to City Hall, two hundred and twenty-five more senior citizen units, a year of Tercentenary celebrations, and a seven million dollar harbour facility.

Protest Day

One thousand five hundred workers joined together last Thursday to protest in Confederation Park. The demonstrators wore work boots and overalls, uniforms, and jackets belonging to unions. White collar workers and professionals were absent, except for a few onlookers.

Most of those participating seemed to feel that this protest marked the beginning of a more cohesive labor front in Kingston and throughout Canada. Many expressed ill-feelings towards both Trudeau and the Liberal party. Either a control on rising prices or a general revocation of all wage and price controls was called for.

Motel proposal

The plans for a six-storey motel located next to the old fire hall on Ontario Street have been approved by City Council.

The building is located across from the City Hall, on Barry Street. The roof line of the motel will be two feet higher than that of City Hall, and may jar with the old city aspect of that area. Also proposed is converting the lire hall into a restaurant.

New LaSalle Mews

The old LaSalle Hotel was turned into the new LaSalle Mews. The character of the building has been preserved to as great an extent as possible. The inner courtyard, formerly used to stable horses, has been provided with benches and will be a nice spot to rest in during a tiring shopping spree. A reflecting pool enhances the interior, and one of the original old fireplaces has been preserved.

Located around the courtyard are twenty-two shops, a restaurant-tavern, and various business offices. It is not meant to be a shopping-centre, but rather a group of specialty-stores, of higher quality.

Cancer predictions

Opinions are divided as to the value of chemical additives in our food. Dr. Ross Hume, who recently talked to students on campus, predicted that everyone will have cancer by 2,000 AD, if the present rate continues.

He pointed out our lack of knowledge about the relationships between food and cancer. One problem is that 54 percent of the calories we eat come from refined food, and that in ten years time, this percentage is likely to come close to the 100 percent mark. Another is the existence of 35,000 different chemical food additives in the average diet of Canadians. And no one knows what the effects of various combinations of these additives are.

To support his statements, Dr. Hume produced some rather alarming facts. Some chocolate on sale today is made from cottonseed oil, but 40 percent of all pesticides sprayed on North American plants are sprayed on cotton. And since labelling laws don't demand full disclosure of actual contents, some tins of tomato paste, for instance, may contain three different coal tar dyes, all of which are possible carcinogenic substances.

Oddities and Tidbits

A stubborn bartender in Marseilles, France, was shot to death by an angry neighbor when he refused to lower the volume of his jukebox.

High-rise buildings mounted on springs installed between the foundation and the main building structure have been tested in Ashkabad. Tass news agency says that this new construction method might be a solution for earthquake-prone areas.

The famous British phlegm surfaced in a Yorkshire pub recently. A drinker died suddenly of a heart-attack. His fellows could find neither undertaker nor doctor, so they laid the cadaver out on barroom chairs and finished their evening's drinking in peace.

Galbraith avoids talk of controls

In his keynote address as Brockington Visitor, Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith called upon his fellow economists to re-examine the marketplace and "Abandon the current myths and accept what presently exists."

Galbraith, while addressing himself to the topic, "Economic Dynamics and the Modern Corporate State" before an audience of roughly 1000 people, managed to launch a diatribe against his colleagues who say that, "The consumer is sovereign and that the firm does not have power."

Dr. Galbraith, in refuting these and other notions of conventional economists in regards to corporations, referred to citizens' concerns about big firms stating, "People feel that there is something deceptive about the modern corporation." As for the structure of giant corporations, Galbraith stated that, "The corporation moves power away from the stockholders."

The noted Harvard professor later used his familiar argument of the importance of big government interacting with big labour and big business. Citing British Leyland and Rolls Royce, Galbraith noted "government is the safety net that corporations fall into upon hard times."

Perhaps of interest to the Grant Hall audience, was not what Galbraith said, but what he left unsaid, specifically on the topic of Wage and Price Controls of which he is a leading advocate. Indeed, in prefacing his speech Dr. Galbraith made fleeting references to Prime Minister Trudeau's control program by noting that "it was Stanfield that I undertook to instruct about Wage and Price Controls."

Those were Dr. Galbraith's only comments about Canadian Wage and Price Controls until the issue was raised in a brief question-and-answer period after the speech. In response to a question about this nation's Wage and Price Controls, the Canadian-born economist did not formulate an answer, replying "I haven't familiarized myself with the details."

At a press conference held after the speech Dr. Galbraith did comment on the American price freeze. Galbraith noted that while Nixon's Wage and Price Controls were not well administered, "when they were abandoned the economy was in incredibly good shape."

Despite the fact his address wasn't on Wage and Price Controls, over 1000 people turned out to hear Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith at Grant Hall last Monday night.

Tradition since 1889:

"Retrieve experience" Dean tells freshettes

The common bond of friendship among women at Queen's was pledged once more Wednesday evening at the Candlelighting Ceremony at Grant Hall.

The tradition of passing on the flame of knowledge and friendship was begun by the Levana Society in 1889. Mrs. Evelyn Reid, Dean of Women, welcomed the 1180 new females to Queen's.

The guest speaker for the evening was Dr. Naomi Griffiths, Associate Dean of Arts at Carleton University. Griffiths advised the women that they are not alone, they must retrieve the valuable women's experience from the past.

The noted academic cautioned the young women to remember that we are not the first intelligent generation of women. She defined Women's Liberation as "not merely women on the move, but the whole human race. Women are human first and women second."

Dr. Griffiths advised the women not to denigrate the women who were mothers. She quoted an apt statement: "You do not disdain a genetic heritage, do not disdain a social heritage."

Finally, Professor Griffiths warned the women against losing their sense of humour in their search for identity.

Dean Reid and Dr. Griffiths passed the flame to the faculty representatives who lit the candles at the end of each row. Then the women passed the flame towards the center of the hall to the accompaniment of the bagpipes. While the candles were lit, the women pledged loyalty to the AMS and to the spirit of Queen's.

Student dies in car crash

Philip Charles Calnan, a fourth year Geology student, was killed early Monday morning as a result of a car accident. The car in which he was riding crashed into the liquor store at 2421 Princess Street.

Lawrence Hagan, also in the car, is in Kingston General Hospital, suffering from multiple fractures. His condition, on Tuesday, was reported as fair.

Charles Calnan, a native of Cobourg, is survived by his parents, two brothers, and a sister. Funeral arrangements have not yet been made.

A touch of tradition

In accordance with a tradition which has been with us for nearly 90 years, Queen's freshettes gathered in Grant Hall last Monday evening to observe the annual Candlelighting Ceremony.

"Students will believe anything"

see page 12

An unfortunate lapse

Principal Watts on Monday night hailed this year's Brockington Visitor John Kenneth Galbraith, in no less lyrical terms than as "a part of the treasure of North America". This was indicative of the high expectations held by the university community for perhaps the most exciting and provocative public figure to accept the Brockington Visitorship. It was a stimulating prospect indeed that the name of Galbraith was to be added to the list of previous Brockington Visitors: Lester Pearson, Sir Bernard Lovell, Gunnar Myrdal, Buckminster Fuller, and Claude Ryan.

Yet, these high hopes were scarcely realized. The problem arose when Professor Galbraith was moved to curtail his stay to a duration of only one day. Whether it was due to his commitments to the BBC or to the U.S. Democratic Party and the Carter-Mondale team, it was unfortunate that this year's Brockington visitorship was not accorded its customary importance. Indeed the purpose of the Brockington visitorship was paid only token attention.

The University operated under somewhat of a false pretense when Professor Galbraith was presented as the Brockington Visitor for, in fact, he did not fulfill the general criteria. No university student could deny the advantage to be gained from being able to host a distinguished man such as Galbraith, even if for only one public appearance. Yet the Brockington Visitor Committee has done a disservice to the illustrious Visitorship by according full stature to Galbraith's one-day visit.

This occasion is very special, and the University is under some obligation to keep it true to its original design. That is, for a respected person with accomplishments of international renown to spend at least five days at the disposal of the Queen's Community, in an informal atmosphere, in addition to giving one public address. The operative concept being that this person will be in a position to share his or her experience and knowledge while immersed in the penetrating, inquisitive atmosphere of university life. Given such criteria, Professor Galbraith's one-day visit cannot be considered a Brockington visit.

There is another element in the disappointment of last Monday. At a morning seminar on development, sponsored by the Institute of Commonwealth and Comparative Studies, Professor Galbraith displayed an obvious disinterest which, when compounded by an intellectually arrogant approach, revealed a patronizing attitude towards those in attendance. This can hardly be considered fitting of the spirit of the Brockington Visit. Moreover, it would not likely have occurred in the context of a proper Brockington Visit. The close, relaxed, continuous interaction between students, faculty and visitor should effectively prevent a superficial and one-sided meeting. Professor Galbraith's fatigue and disinterest, while partially understandable, given the rigorous pace of his schedule, severely undermined the prestige of the Leonard Brockington Visitorship.

It was only a short time ago, March of this year, that M. Claude Ryan held a very different attitude toward this event. Ryan said that his week here at Queen's was a time of great challenge and intellectual replenishment. Ryan was greatly honoured to be invited and he responded with hard work during his entire week at Queen's.

Presumably Professor Galbraith was not sensitive to the nature and importance of the academic event which is the Brockington Visitorship. It is to be hoped that in future years the true value of the Visitorship will be respected. This year's lapse was most unfortunate.

Californian censors

Unlike our counterparts in California, the Ontario student press faces no restrictions in its choice of editorial topics. Believe it or not, the campus newspapers in that State are forbidden from dealing editorially with non-campus issues because the administration feels universities may lose their tax-exempt status as a result of published student dissent.

Had this student censorship taken place in Uganda it would not have been a surprise, but California? Surely a university should provide the greatest forum for current intellectual analysis, debate and criticism. Granted there are a great many advocates of leftist thought participating in the production of campus papers throughout North America. But are the Californians so grossly intolerant of dissent that they would restrict the freedom of speech?

It is ironic that such uncharacteristic behaviour should take place during the celebration of that nation's bicentennial of the declaration of their moral principles and independence.

Postpone National Students Day?

WINNIPEG (CUP) — National Student Day should be postponed until the federal-provincial governments agree on the five-year formula for funding post-secondary education, according to new federal secretary of state John Roberts.

Roberts, who first heard of the day Oct. 5, called the Nov. 9 date "bizarre".

Student leaders should wait until the Fiscal Arrangements Act (FAA), which controls most cost-sharing agreements between the federal and provincial governments, is negotiated before reacting, he said.

National Union of Students (NUS) president Riel Miller said it actually makes more sense to have the day before negotiations are complete so students can have some "democratic" input into the discussions. All FAA negotiations are secret.

The day is not dependent on the FAA, Miller said, because it deals with many outside issues such as unemployment and the role and quality of higher education.

Although the secretary of state is responsible for post-secondary education, Roberts refused to comment on current FAA negotiations, saying it is the responsibility of the minister of finance.

Currently, the federal government gives direct grants to the provinces for higher education, however education ministers have discussed replacing this with a transfer of tax points.

Several smaller, poorer provinces say their smaller tax bases will mean decreased funding for higher education.

AMS recommends changes for Library

by Chris Hall

A series of recommendations concerning the future of the library system at Queen's were proposed by Education Commissioner Morris Chocla at Thursday's AMS Outer Council meeting. The recommendations can be stated as follows: that the university should have a complete and current level of book, serial and documentary acquisitions, and that an adequate and efficient staff able to maintain an acceptable level of information delivery be maintained.

Currently, the Library is allotted approximately $700,000 to buy materials. Mr. Chocla has stated that this amount is insufficient in keeping the Library adequately stocked. Since 1970-71, a fifty per cent decrease in serials has occurred. A budget of $1,200,000 is needed to buy materials at the 1970-71 level. Financial constraint has also led to a fifteen per cent reduction in Library staff from 1970 to the present day. This reduction in staff has also led to shorter library hours. Mr. Chocla feels that more and more students use the library; therefore, the demand for materials and longer hours is far greater than in previous years.

Another area of concern as stated in the recommendations is the lack of any comprehensive plan for space allocation in the Douglas Library. Mr. Chocla wants to know if the university has made any plans for physical expansion, and if so, to inform the student body of them.

Finally, Mr. Chocla wants the entire concept of the decentralization system at Queen's to be critically examined. "The operation of 21 branch libraries in addition to Douglas is entirely unreasonable in light of financial resources now available."

Plans are underway for rape crisis centre

by Barb Ashdown

Mary Biehn, a co-ordinator of the Queen's Women's Centre, is presently working to establish a Rape Crisis Centre to be of service to Queen's students as well as to the Kingston community. The Centre will be designed to cope with rape victims and to offer them legal counselling and psychological encouragement. Other members of Queen's Women's Centre, including Jill Cowan, Dallas, Breshnahan and Carol Renner, feel the need for such a service and are gathering contacts and models for the formation of a Rape Crisis Centre.

The Centre will model its organization on the Rape Crisis Centre in Toronto as well as the one at Carleton University in Ottawa. The Women's Centre is gathering information from Waterloo's Charioteer, which is printing articles on the need for Rape Crisis Centres at universities. Biehn insists that Kingston has a particular need for such a centre, and that Kingston Police are not adequately aware of the gravity of the rape situation. Funding for the Centre will originate from the Queen's Women's Centre, but it is hoped that the Rape Crisis Centre will eventually hold its own office and fund itself independently.

Mary Biehn is very interested in the promotion of the Rape Crisis Centre and invites all those interested to contact the Queen's Women's Centre office to offer advice or assistance. There is presently a core of fifteen people at work on the project and it is hoped that the Rape Crisis Centre will soon be underway, and be of service to Kingston.

MLA for Kingston & Islands

Tuition hike is forseen

by Ian Robinson

"I'd be astounded if tuition fees rose more than $100 next September. I've discussed it with Harry Parrott." That was local MLA Keith Norton's reply to the rumor that tuition fees may rise to $1000 next year. He was addressing a meeting of the P.C. Youth, held in the Student Union Building last Wednesday evening. Mr. Norton expressed the opinion that the primary factor affecting accessibility to university was not the cost of tuition, but sociological handicaps that must be dealt with long before students reach university age.

Concerning provincial government plans to alleviate the high rate of student unemployment last year, he was less reassuring. "We may have to rely more on our own imagination and initiative", he said. Mr. Norton predicted that when rent and housing controls end next August, they will be replaced in Kingston by "some kind of mechanism" operating on a municipality basis. It was pointed out that OSAP was presently being revamped, with results soon to be made public. Asked whether present government trends might indicate that it would become increasingly difficult to obtain, Mr. Norton said no, but was unable to elaborate.

He concluded the question and answer period by urging that the Young P.C.'s organize committees on the important issues so that student input could be increased. Mr. Norton last spoke to a meeting of the Queen's Young P.C. last Spring.

Students doubling Up on housing this year

by Maben Smith

The Kingston Housing Policy Study, a report prepared for the city by a Toronto firm, examines among other topics, the housing situation with respect to students of Queen's. The study, published last month, investigates housing trends in the city from 1961 to the present time, summarizes pertinent issues for 1976, outlines opportunities and constraints regarding housing and concludes by listing eighty-eight policy recommendations for the city.

With respect to Queen's, the study underlines the importance of off-campus housing for its students, particularly those within walking distance of the main campus. Sixty per cent of all students living off-campus are estimated to be within ten walking minutes of the university with as many as eighty per cent regularly walking to classes. There has been a pronounced shift in this type of student, the study announces. Eighty-four per cent are unmarried, an increase of ten per cent in almost as many years. Forty-two per cent are female, an increase from the twenty-six per cent of the 1968-69 academic year.

Students are showing a distinct preference to share accommodation. Seventy per cent of off-campus students share their accommodations, as compared to fifty per cent eight years ago. With statistics from the Queen's Off-Campus Housing Survey, the study underlines the dramatic rise from nineteen per cent to forty-five per cent of students living with three or more others. Thus almost a third of all Queen's students occupy a unit of multiple dwelling.

With these figures in mind, the study addresses the situation with regard to the off-campus housing market. Although the enrollment figures have at present tapered off, it is felt the pressure on this market will continue to increase due to the aforementioned trend in accommodation preferences. From 1968 to now, the number of students renting houses or duplexes has risen by two hundred and eighty-three per cent to a total of almost two thousand students. In the total Kingston picture, Queen's students are occupying an eighth of the low rise stock available for rental, and a seventh of the city's apartment units. "Overall their incursion into the private market represents 8.1 per cent of all occupied dwellings in the city." This is a forty per cent increase over that figure predicted for off-campus housing demand in 1970.

Recommendation 33 to 37 refer directly to student housing. It is recommended that the university and city cooperate to expand accommodation, thereby minimizing their impact on family-type accommodation in the city. A suggestion is for a three semester year; utilizing housing annually, not partly. The university should be encouraged to expand its residential services, undergoing a construction program that is within the university's financial capabilities. Both the city and university should investigate jointly the provision of non-profit housing units primarily for students. Furthermore, the university should, through public funds, be able to finance renovations in the immediate campus area.

Everything you ever wanted to know about biking

by Trish Crowe

Over one-quarter of the students at Queen's travel by bicycle. How many do so legally is often questionable. Very few students are aware of the laws concerning bicycle-riding in Kingston and will be in for a shock when they realize they may be breaking the law every time they ride down the street.

In an interview with the Journal, Sgt. McKegney, Traffic Safety Officer for the Kingston Police Force, explained the law as it applies to the Kingston cyclist.

All bicycles on the streets of Kingston must be registered and licensed. Licenses cost only $3 and are a legal requirement. They provide police with information as to bicycle ownership if a bike is ever stolen or found.

A $5 fine could be the penalty for not having a white light on the front of the bike, a red reflector light on the back, a twelve inch strip of white reflective material on the front fender, and not less than a ten inch strip of red reflective material on the rear fender or fenders.

According to the Highway Traffic Act, a bicycle is classified as a vehicle and as such, is subject to the road laws which apply to any other vehicle. The operator must stop for stop signs, traffic lights and crossing guards, or face a $28 penalty. They're not permitted to ride on sidewalks or the wrong way on a one-way street. Proper signals must be given before making a turn or stopping. Pedestrians have the right of way at intersections. Bicycles must stop for a schoolbus with its warning-lights flashing.

In general, any restriction which applies to motor vehicles is applicable to bicycles as well.

Defensive driving is important at all times, regardless of the mode of transportation.

If caught without the required equipment, or committing an illegal action, one can go broke paying the ensuing fines. It's better for all to be prepared before venturing out onto Kingston streets.

75 kids on waiting list

Q.D.C. expansion needed

by Anne Johnson

Two years ago, in response to the needs and requests of the Queen's and Kingston communities, the Queen's Co-operative Day Care Centre was established, funded mainly by the provincial government and provided a rent-free building by Queen's.

Now it seems that this much-needed facility is inadequate to meet the need of the Queen's community itself. Q.D.C. is licensed for 40 children (from ages 6 months to 4 years), yet has a waiting list of 75. According to Susan Wehlan, the director of Q.D.C., most applicants are Queen's students - mainly because the location is so accessible for students as well as faculty.

Ms. Wehlan emphasized that as much as possible, she refers those on the waiting list to one or both of the other two centres in the Kingston area. The problem here however is that these other two centres are not close to campus, and often students have no mode of transportation. As well, the Municipal center has stricter subsidy qualification standards than the Q.D.C., so that if the applicant does not support the city, he or she does not qualify for a subsidy. Q.D.C.'s subsidization is based on income levels, and as a consequence nearly 100 percent of student applicants would qualify.

As much as Queen's needs an expansion of its day care facilities, availability of additional funds is almost non-existent. In addition, there have been problems with maintenance because the building is owned by Queen's, the government says it is not responsible for upkeep. The centre is a co-operative effort on the part of parents.

An open house is to be held on November 2, 3 and 4 from 2:30 to 4:00 p.m. Ms. Wehlan invites all interested persons to attend.

Entre la mer et l'eau douce

par Celia Ross

Chaque jeudi soir le département du film présente un film canadien à Ontario Hall, salle 332. Il faut noter que ces films sont présentés le jeudi soir, et non pas le mercredi soir comme annoncé dans le Queens Journal et ailleurs. L'entrée est gratuite, et une très bonne sélection de films sera offerte pendant l'année. Jeudi le 7 octobre Entre la mer et l'eau douce a été montré. Le seul problème était la mauvaise reproduction sonore qui a déformée et rendu indistincte la piste sonore.

L'intrigue du film, cependant, était facile à suivre. Pour le première fois de sa vie Claude, un jeune homme rempli de vigueur, arrive à Montréal, venant de l'Île-aux-coudres où il a vécu avec sa mère et sa sœur dans une vieille ferme isolée. Derrière lui il laisse une Indienne et des souvenirs de leurs "amours paternels", et pour compagnon fidèle il emmène sa guitare.

Il trouve du boulot dans une bouche à feu, sur un chantier, vidant des poubelles. Comme on pourrait s'y attendre, il tombe amoureux d'une serveuse de restaurant, Geneviève. Un peu par hasard il se met en contact avec des directeurs de spectacles cherchant du nouveau talent. Et il "parvient". Des séquences du film nous montrent Claude en train de donner un concert énorme et de remporter un succès grandiose.

Michel Brault, réalisateur de Entre la mer et l'eau douce (tourné en 1967), maintient qu'il faut parler au comédien du personnage qu'il va jouer, afin qu'il s'empare et commence à "vivre par lui-même" quand la caméra se met en marche. Les acteurs principaux, Claude Gauthier et Geneviève Bujold, ont réussi à sentir l'intérieur des personnages qu'il représentaient. Michel Brault a même mêlé un peu de la vie de Claude Gauthier avec certaines scènes de son long métrage.

Brault utilise l'éclairage réel autant que possible. Donc même si le résultat n'est pas très beau, le cadre correspond à la réalité. Son traitement du son est pareil; on entend les émissions monotones de la radio dans la chambre de pension de Claude, le murmure des voix dans le restaurant, les bruits d'une grande ville. Parfois les personnages articulent très mal, ce qui correspond à une façon normale de parler.

La séquence la plus émouvante du film un dialogue entre Claude et Geneviève, est totalement improvisée. Un but auquel Michel Brault aspire est de ne jamais demander à un acteur de recommencer un geste. La spontanéité et la beauté fraîche de ce film sont les résultats de ses efforts dans cette direction.

La musique fournit les plus émouvants moments de ce long métrage. A travers les chansons de Claude Gauthier on aperçoit ses pensées, ses espoirs, ses amours. Le film nous laisse l'impression d'un gars jeune, fragile, joyeux, prêt à aimer, prêt à vivre. C'est un film qui vaut la peine d'être vu.

La bonne cuisine

La recette qui suit est pour vous, mesdemoiselles, qui voulez amadouer votre cavalier, et pour vous aussi messieurs, qui voulez aussi vous enchanter auprès de votre dame. Elle n'est pas au-dessus de vos moyens, et elle est très facile à préparer. C'est une recette française, à la canadienne.

Cog au vin
Ingrédients
4 poitrines de poulets
1/4 tasse de beurre
4 tranches de bacon
3-4 de tasse d'oignons hachés
8 gros champignons
2 gousses d'ail, écrasées
1 tasse de farine
1/2 tasse de vin rouge, très sec
1/2 tasse d'eau bouillante avec un cube

bouillonnaveur de poulet
1. Cuiller à thé de sel
La préparation est d'environ une heure et quart.
1. Coupez le bacon en petit morceaux. Déposer dans une grosse casserole (sur un feu moyen) laissez jusqu'à ce que le bacon soit grillant.
Enlevez le bacon et conservez.
2. Ajoutez le beurre à la graisse de bacon. Brouillez le poulet puis mettez à part.
3. Sauter les oignons, le champignon et les gousses d'ail dans le bouillon. Enlever avec presque tout le bouillon, sauf 2 cuillères à table.
4. Ajouter la farine et brunir, sur un feu moyen pour environ 2 minutes.
5. Retirer du feu. Mélanger le bouillon de poulet et le vin. Retourner au feu.

Non, nous ne sommes pas un pays de glace et de neige!

Depuis un certain temps, il y a une vague de nationalisme qui parcourt notre pays. Ce nationalisme apparaît par-ci, par-là, et on ne sait au juste quoi en penser. Le gouvernement dit être en train de chercher la chose tangible qui aidera le canadien à dire: "Etre canadien, c'est être..." Puis, la chasse au trésor continue.

Notre cher premier ministre se penche du côté de la langue et essaie de convaincre le reste du pays que seulement lorsque nous parlerons deux langues seront nous fiers d'être canadiens. D'autre part, le fameux rapport Symons annonce aux canadiens qu'ils leur faut concentrer plus de programme d'études à l'étude de son pays, de ses cultures, enfin, à tout ce qui compose notre "colonne vertébrale".

Puis, encore une fois on se retourne du côté parlementaire et constate le bill qui fait disparaître Time et compagnie. Les canadiens doivent lire des journaux et des magazines canadiens! C'est ce que la voix d'en haut nous dit. Mais qui doit écrire les magazines comme l'Actualité, ou son confrère anglais, Maclean's? D'où doivent venir ces gens?

Ces gens, ce sont nous, étudiants universitaires qui graduated prochainement. Mais regardons autour de nous, dans notre petit univers plutôt limité, qu'est le campus de Kingston. C'est bien beau de chercher le fameux trésor qui nous transformera tous en canadiens "pure laine", mais au lieu de nous suivre l'impossible, pourquoi pas essayer de chercher à un niveau plus pratique?

Il faudrait que quelqu'un commence par examiner la réception des bouises du "Canada Council". Ces bouises sont remises à nos gradués pour qu'ils puissent poursuivre leurs études, et afin de revenir à nos universités, enrichies et prêtes à "illuminer" les infotunés. Ne serait-ce le temps et le lieu idéal pour faire l'étude de soi en ce qui constitue l'anatomie du canadien? Au lieu de diriger le gradué vers l'analyse d'un autre aspect de Voltaire, de Hugo ou bien de Dickens et de Poe, ne serait-ce plus avantageux pour lui-même et d'une façon, pour réaliser le but du gouvernement - découvrir l'âme canadienne? Cette âme qui se trouve cachée dans les gens comme les Tremblay, les Bessette, les Atwood, les Laurence, par exemple. Comme notre gouvernement est sûr qu'il y a un caractère typiquement canadien et est prêt à dépenser des sommes d'argent assez importantes, ne devrions-nous pas le surveiller de plus près? Ne s'avoue-t-il pas vaincu lorsqu'il envoie les plus brillants de ses étudiants étudier les coutumes et écrits de peuples étrangers? Quelqu'un a déjà dit qu'il fallait se connaître avant d'apprécier son voisin. Comment est-ce que ces pauvres gens peuvent venir à apprécier le monde étranger avant de se connaître à fond?

Nous devons répéter les principes de François-Xavier Garneau d'il y a plus de cent ans, et l'étendre pour couvrir le Canada "ad maiorem usque maiorem". Qui, nous avons une histoire, une culture... une façon bien à nous d'affronter la vie. Et laissons leur à savoir!

(Boussille, pour les justes)

La solidité du toit de Leonard Hall

Avez-vous déjà eu l'honneur d'être présent à la salle à manger du Leonard Hall durant un des nombreux "animal stumps"? Si oui, la pensée vous est-elle déjà venue que le toit pouvait s'effondrer sous le poids de tous ces gens "animals" qui sautent tout-en criant "Animal stump".

Amener à ébullition tout en brossant. 6. Réduire le feu. Assaisonner avec le sel, la feuille de laurier, poivre, et thym. Ajouter les morceaux de bacon, le poulet, les oignons, champignons, et gousses d'ail. Couvrir et laissez mijoter pendant 30-45 minutes ou jusqu'à ce que le poulet soit cuit. (vous pouvez ajouter des carottes).

Bon Appétit

Eh bien ces qui sautent sont les désormais moins célèbres "Animal stumps" qui ont causé d'un apport qui a paru quelque part et qui disait: "la structure du toit de la salle à manger du Leonard Hall (également le plancher de l'Annex) n'est pas sécuritaire et que des secousses violentes pourraient être néfastes. Eh bien quand trente personnes pesant en moyenne 150 livres sautent, cela provoque (croyez-moi) quelques secousses assez violentes. Le résultat est que le plancher vibre, surtout au-dessus du deuxième chandelier à paiti du centre, et donne envie à ceux qui sont en dessous de démanager.

Ces "Animal stumps" font peur à beaucoup de monde avec leur "animal stumps". Mais tant et aussi longtemps qu'ils sautent on nous les craignons.

God isn't dead - he never lived

by Howard Smith

Modern-day religion is a human power-struggle which has little or nothing to do with what it preaches. Power, as that which gives one person the right to dominate or control others, takes various forms.

In our society one might think it is the law that controls the use of power and its effect upon our conduct. There are, however, many forms of human conduct controlled by rules not a function of the law.

Consider the "Laws" of Religion: if the man in the pulpit can tell you when to go to church, when to donate, how to treat your wife or do your job, he exerts power over you. When the Pope says "the Pill" is out, thousands of people bow to his authority. This is power. The organized and formal pecking order of the modern day church attests to its reality.

It's all too easy to think of religion as some divine intervention for the purposes of directing human destiny. It's far more likely that religion, like the law, is another example of the human struggle for control.

This is not to suggest that the creators of the modern church had our worst interests at heart. On the contrary, they may have enshrined within their bosoms our communal welfare. It's possible to be genuinely altruistic even though your actions are in fact detrimental.

Nevertheless, it is probable that the religion of Christ's era had a good deal of social utility. A general principle which can be gleaned is: "sensual activities are sinful." Here religion discouraged sloth, gluttony and lust. A lazy, fat, horny society was unproductive, and when men had no machines, progress was contingent upon hard (as in back-breaking) work. Illicit sex led to unwanted babies where no social system existed to deal with them, social diseases which were inevitably fatal, and community violence when betrayed spouses made discoveries.

Looking seriously at the tenets of the church in this vein, one can see they were indeed formulas for social stability in an era when the laws weren't effective and human conduct was difficult to control.

As much brilliance as went into the constructs of religion for the progress of society, none matched the sheer genius of the "Big Brother" principle. George Orwell may have thought he contrived a supreme diabolical weapon when he created the "thought police" in his book 1984. This force was always ready to watch you - Big Brother could be watching anytime.

It wasn't really new however, as Christianity put God behind your shoulder 2,000 years ago. Human systems of surveillance and detection are fallible, but nothing escapes the eternally watchful eye of God.

Suddenly everyone has a record he can't conceal and when your number is up, you'll pay. What could be more effective than perfect surveillance with a type of "justice" in the end that should have frightened every pre-medieval mind into whimpering submission?

As to 1976, the prospect of cooking in eternal flames or permanent ecstasy in the sight of God wears a little thin in terms of credibility. The utility of religion in the face of an organized society is becoming questionable. Philosophies we may seek, but whether such need be framed in terms of Heaven or Hell, Christ or Satan is certainly a matter worth doubting. The church remains of social value as a convenient location for community gatherings, but even this is a role well served by other amenities such as social and sporting clubs.

The modern-day church is an anachronism devoid of social utility, a fool's gallery in the power struggle long since transferred to another forum. The sooner men's minds are seized of this recognition, the sooner will we be freed of this albatross of historically unprecedented proportions.

'Canadian-ness'

by Trish Crowe

I was sitting in Mac-Corry the other day, sipping my coffee and diligently reading my notes when I overheard the two men behind me, as their conversation gradually became more and more heated.

They were complaining vehemently about the "foreigners" who were trying to take over the Queen's campus initially, then the Kingston community, then the whole country.

I had visions of little people running around in trenchcoats, with signs on their backs declaring them "foreigners", infiltrating all levels of social, political and economic organizations, knocking off the "Canadians" in the higher echelons of these organizations, and cunningly taking their places. I envisioned a scene, out of a lower B-grade movie, with someone such as Gene McCarthy as director and producer.

The two people behind me continued their conversation, with the more vocal man declaring he had nothing against "them", but just didn't like the way they were moving in on things which belong to "real Canadians". An interesting statement, to be sure.

Just what exactly is a "real Canadian"? If "real Canadians" gain this distinction as a result of being born in Canada or having Canadian parents this counts me out on one criteria at least. But I consider myself Canadian, and am not greeted with cries of derision or disbelief when I say this. The fact that I've only spent about ten years of my life within Canadian borders does not seem to have a negative effect on my "Canadian-ness" either. Perhaps it's because I'm Caucasian that I'm automatically accepted as a "real Canadian."

I used to think of Canada as being the land of hope and glory, milk and honey, and all the rest. Racial prejudice never reared its ugly head within our towns, because Canadians just weren't like that. My rose-coloured view of Canadian communities has been tainted somewhat, as I recently made the discovery that Canadians generally are as narrow-minded and inclined to prejudicial thinking as any other group of people.

Just what brought about this change of thinking, or whether in fact a change occurred is open to discussion. It's quite possible that Canadians have always thought along the same lines as the two men in Mac-Corry, just that they disguised this thinking.

When Canada was a younger country, "foreigners" didn't exist as such, because all Canadians were essentially foreign. As the years progressed, the more established Canadians (i.e. those whose families had been in Canada for 'x' number of years) became the superior groups, in terms of "Canadian-ness". Squatters' rights seem to be in effect, as these Canadians see themselves as deserving of privileges with regards to educational and occupational opportunities, merely because of their family history in Canada.

As new Canadians move into this country and attempt to take advantage of the educational and occupational opportunities which should be as open to them as to any other Canadian, those who consider themselves "real Canadians" feel threatened, suffering from a grand inferiority complex which increases as they feel themselves being threatened by the "foreigner". When you get right down to it, however, the ridiculousness of such a feeling becomes more and more apparent. The world does not seem to be getting so bad that people are afraid of others and that others present to their well being, but when the thin at comes in the form of a person with a different skin colour or an unusual accent, it's a different matter.

It's a pretty sad situation if people generally become so petty as to worry about infiltration by "foreigners". People who come from other countries have a great deal to add to the Canadian society, not only culturally but economically as well. These are the real Canadians since they are doing their best to improve conditions in the Canadian community and are not inhibited by anti prejudices.

Galbraith "a hack"?

by Gerry Lewarne

Although John Kenneth Galbraith has the title of economist, he clearly is not only that. He is also a sociologist. Galbraith believes that large corporations have too much power.

He says that they have the power to control both the markets from which they buy raw materials and the markets to which they sell finished goods. Therefore, he believes we ought to have wage and price controls so that the large corporations cannot run wild.

The most basic reason for the power of the corporations, Galbraith says, is their ability to plan. Planning is done by groups of specialists who bring their narrow technical skills to bear on a large problem. This is a basically sociological theory of where power lies in a society.

To implement wage and price guidelines, though, in order to control the large corporations appears to be a non sequitur. As Ross Sutherland and Bill Burgess pointed out in this paper two weeks ago, it was very simple for Weston Bakeries to hide behind their massive structure so as to increase the price of bread. Trying to control the group planning of 500 or 1000 large companies would be impossible unless the government had a staff of five to ten thousand researchers and access to all the information that the planning groups have.

The way to break the power of the large corporations is to legislate modern anti-trust laws. Far from being cesspools into which the vacant liberal mind sinks, good ones would break the corporations' power. U.S. Steel is not large because its size reduces production costs, it is large so that it can employ planners that can control U.S. Steel's markets. A past president of U.S. Steel has said that more aggregate profit could be earned if the company was broken up into 50 smaller companies.

Galbraith says that all anti-trust laws can hope to do is "transform a monopoly into an oligopoly or an oligopoly into slightly more of an oligopoly." One Queen's economist (who described Galbraith as a hack) says that more firms are precisely what is required if the market is to become dominant again.

I would not call Galbraith a hack, but he really ought to take a look at some modern-day anti-trust laws.

The Bus-It

system revisited

Dear Editor:

We would like to express our concern over the fate of BUS-IT. We think this is a valuable service for the vast majority of Queen's students.

There are approximately 10,000 students at Queen's, approximately 15 percent of whom live on Main Campus. Most of us who live more than half a mile out depend on BUS-IT for classes, for activities on campus (whether they be social or extra-curricular) and for transportation to various retail outlets.

BUS-IT is not exorbitant. At present costs $5.35 per student. At the present K.T. rates, a student need only make one round trip downtown per month to justify this investment. Those of us who must take the bus every day for classes would spend a minimum of $78.00 per year on fares without BUS-IT.

If the AMS were to withdraw its support from BUS-IT completely, the greater cost would still be only a fraction of the $78.00 minimum yearly expenditure. If the AMS wishes to keep student's costs down while protecting the interests of the students, they should retain BUS-IT for those who wish the service to be continued. Perhaps an equivalent to the Phys-Ed center stamps on student cards could be put into practice.

Shuttle-buses operated by Queen's would probably be more expensive and less reliable. They would cover fewer routes at less efficiency than a professional service.

We agree with the statement that "the service is...a virtually indispensable link between main and west campuses." It is also an indispensable link between Jeanne Mance, the John Orr Tower, the Van Order Complex and Main Campus.

It is to be hoped that the service may be continued, even though it may be of greater cost to the student. However, if BUS-IT is to be discontinued for the student body as a whole, those of us who wish to support it ought to have the option open to us.

WLC said Unrepresentative

Dear Editor:

The Women's Law Caucus made a valid, if not trite point when they emphasized that articles written by myself in no way reflect the opinions of the Law Society, which I represent. As they themselves noted I do not "purport" to write for the Journal in (my) capacity as President of The Law Society.

Their second criticism goes to my participation, as President of The Law Society, on Outer Council of the AMS. They contend, and reasonably so, that the role of a society president is to represent his constituents. Their proposal that some mechanism be created to ensure that I live up to this standard implies that I have not done so. It is suggested that in expressing a strong opinion against the C.L.C. strike, I may not have advanced the Law Student opinion - moreover that I made no effort to "consult" my "Faculty" to be sure of their stance.

It troubles me not a little that Law students, most particularly, those of the Women's Law Caucus who are well apprised of questions of justice, should make such allegations without ever once having enquired of me as to whether I did in fact make "some effort to consult (my) faculty". The Caucus does not know the answer to this question.

If by "consult (my) faculty" the Caucus intended that a survey or questionnaire was in order, they have surely misunderstood the principle of representative government. Clearly it would not be feasible to put every decision from the purchase of postage stamps to the expenditure of society funds to the masses. This would not be representative leadership for it would not be leadership at all. If every decision was made by everybody, you wouldn't need a society president. Such government is beyond feasibility.

By representative, what is meant is that the leader attempts to predict, through feasible and accessible means, the likely choices of his constituents. The voter attempts to predict who will best do this. In the C.L.C. matter, I was led to believe the majority of Queen's Law Students would disavow the C.L.C. protest I challenge the Women's Law Caucus to prove otherwise.

The quintessence of this problem lies in recognizing that the Women's Law Caucus is a minority group in the Law School, and one that strongly disagreed with the stance I put to Outer Council. As much as I sympathize with the lot of the minority, it is nevertheless not my role to seek to represent their views at the expense of the majority's.

It's Successful:

The Blood Clinic

Dear Editor:

We hope that we can have this letter published in the Queen's Journal.

On October 13th and 14th the Queen's Engineering Society sponsored a very successful Blood Donor Clinic for the Red Cross. The co-operation was tremendous, with 920 registered and getting approximately 900 units of blood that was so badly needed.

On October 14th the co-operation was particularly excellent, we were able to fly a consignment of blood to our labs in Ottawa where the precious cryoprecipitate was extracted. The flight was made possible through the volunteer work of George Binnington, of Binnington Motors.

Again on behalf of the Red Cross we want to extend our sincere thanks to all those who participated, and to all those who gave blood we can only say that we are very proud of you.

Thanks again, and we hope that you will continue to support the Red Cross in the future.

Very sincerely,

L.E. Campbell

Blood Donor Service Chairman.

Praise of David

Dear Editor:

Congratulations to David Gay on his most amusing piece, "Apathy and the Otherwise Meek DSC" ("Peripheral Visions," October 14). This skillfully written column points out better than many a ponderous discussion the dismal state of disrepute into which the DSC's have fallen in the eyes of many students. Perhaps students and faculty alike should take another look at the purposes for which the DSC's were instituted.

Right it 50 times

Dear Editor:

Once again, we would like to offer some inimicable comments on your latest egregious editorial, "A Case against Bird."

In regard to your printing of our last letter, we discovered no less than four errors of transcription. Two of these can be attributed to the usual negligent proofreading. The remaining errors, however, could have conceivably changed the context of our criticism. A distinct difference does exist between the prefixed "hypo" and "hyper."

Your opening three stanzas are acceptable, aside from sporadic technical errors such as the misspelling of underprivileged, the inconsistency in reference to Ms. Bird and the questionable creation of the word "oversold" (Consultation of the two widely respected dictionaries uncovered no such word.)

In the fourth paragraph, you stated that "The renowned feminist failed to ignite a formidable audience reaction here." We are sure you can see the ambiguity caused by the redundant "here." Is the audience or the reaction "formidable"? Furthermore, the next sentence contained a "perceptive" view of the fact that there is a difference between American and Canadian society; but you fail to elaborate on the difference. Moreover, your description of "student backgrounds, size, administrative organization and attitudes" as being SPECIFIC is ludicrous. Is used, the verbose expression, "administrative organization" could be easily contracted into the more expedient and succinct "administration."

The concluding paragraph contains a reference to "the Canadian Universities," implying there are only THE two or three in Canada, not to mention the unnecessary capitalization of "Universities." In your last sentence, we are unsure as to who is conceding what. Constraints of space prevent us from elaborating. Finally, we can see that you wish to illustrate that Ms. Bird's reference to the "State" of Ontario is worse than her knowledge of our teacher training system. However, the impact is lost through the childish use of "is one thing" "is another." The comparison is rendered empty.

We hope the journal staff is not offended by our somewhat vitriolic criticisms. Still, in the pursuit of quality journalism, we feel it necessary to remind you of these transgressions. Forgivingly yours, Anthony Wood and Cameron Wade

The liberal arts - merely a luxury?

University education, particularly in the liberal arts, is scoring some points these days for accessibility and breadth of scope. It seems, all the same, to be a losing proposition according to many people's rules - a poor investment by student and society alike.

This notion of impracticality was put forward by Paul Grescoe in a recent edition of the "Canadian Magazine," under the title "The Real Cost of College." Almost simultaneously, the September "Maclean's" asked "Are Canadians Getting Their $12 Billion Worth?" All the while, allegations arise of rampant illiteracy on campus. Could our time and money be much better spent?

Grescoe focused his article on a mock diploma citing the graduate's investment of some $43,000 in place of the usual description of academic achievements. About a quarter of this outlay was attributed to room and board, textbooks, clothing and transportation. One envisions the wise non-student returning from his $10,000-per year job (national average) to his rent-free lodgings. He then watches TV naked, having presumably reverted to the national reading standard of less than one book per year. By not travelling anywhere Mr. Grescoe's model is able to avoid eating.

We are made to witness the spectre of graduates, even post-graduates, devoting their talents to signing pique cheques or performing mindless tasks. Ph.D.'s sorting mail and biologists driving cabs somehow evidence the utter failure of higher education to achieve its sacred goals. These graduates didn't escape harsh economic realities. They merely delayed the inevitable at great expense to the public purse, by languishing in Masters or Doctorate programmes.

It could be argued that such fates are neither disastrous nor even particularly common. For every post-graduate presently digging ditches,

how many 'mere' B.A.'s have parlayed their degrees into success in executive positions, free-lance writing, or other fields? The attributes of imagination and ingenuity still serve well those who possess them. Grescoe's careful choice of examples implies only an inverse relation between these qualities and the number of years spent in the ivory tower.

Associate Dean (Studies) David McLay, of the Faculty of Arts and Science, concedes the correctness "in a superficial way" of most of what the article stated. He sought to downplay, however, the horrors of "overeducation".

"There is nothing inherently wrong with physicists sorting mail or biologists driving taxis; Albert Einstein worked in a patent office after completing his undergraduate education."

The notion that one's employment should reflect one's level of education is accepted by most everyone. That this relationship does not always exist should not, in Dr. McLay's opinion, constitute an indictment of universities for 'false advertising'.

"Students should come to university to develop their intellectual powers, to assimilate meaningful knowledge and to become critically aware. In the process they may well become unsuited to certain types of employment, but that may show weaknesses in those kinds of employment, rather than in higher education."

The point so belaboured by Grescoe refers to a very real problem of shattered expectations and job disillusionment. Is this not, however, less a byproduct of 'irrelevant' schooling than of social and economic pressures from which a university best remains aloof? It is hard to imagine the given 'failure' examples seriously accusing their former professors of negligent teaching. If they did the response might well be a few verses of 'I Never Promised You a Rose Garden'.

The author himself seemed to agree that there are other ends to education than material gain. "Wisdom does bring its own rewards - though they're not necessarily financial." It is a shame that he and many others lose sight of those rewards when discussing public funding.

Grescoe pictures an expanding economy at the end of a garden path of educational spending down which a generation of legislators have been led. There is a certain amount of validity in this argument. However, his quickness to associate national well-being so exclusively with economic well-being suggests that many of our elected representatives may also have operated under the same delusion.

That education is a poor public investment, he argues, follows naturally from the slumping economy of the past several years. The world-wide nature of the present recession is iron-clad proof that these same faculty notions have been international bugaboos. Clearly, Canada has once again forsaken progress to remain 'one of the crowd'.

A 1965 Economic Council of Canada report is cited by Grescoe as having painted too rosy a picture of expected return on educational investment. This recognition of the ECC's error follows by four full years a similar finding on the part of Dr. David A. Dodge of the Queen's Industrial Relations Centre "Social (total) monetary returns to investment (in graduate technical fields) are negative at a discount rate of 5 percent." Which is to say that, even at a low rate of interest, the nation would be far better off investing money elsewhere. The point is, are institutes of higher education to blame for the faulty prediction of a government agency?

Dr. Dodge nonetheless saw some redeeming virtue in government spending on higher education. "Even if economic returns to education were still found to be negative, the investment in graduate training might be justified on non-economic grounds."

These non-economic returns could easily be, in a more 'idealistic' treatment, the stuff of which magazine features are born. National prestige and international goodwill (as in the education of foreign students) are just two such returns. Several other social benefits - say, the advantage of an enlightened electorate in a democratic society exist but are less defensible by mercenary standards.

Paul Grescoe might seem guilty of constructing a shallow argument, though by job definition he may have been bound to do so. In sad truth, he simply catered to the concerns and values of his readership.

Serving up some grapes for the truly educational disadvantaged is forgivable enough. 'Middle Canada', increasingly concerned with financial return naturally wonders to what end taxes and tuition are spent. The social and financial elite have the same qualms, except that for many reasons they can remain above the consequences of either change or stagnation. It was not just for 'The Smug Minority' for whom Pierre Berton spoke, "We have seen them (universities) rather as expensive nuisances, where 'costs' are to be pared to the minimum, and 'frills' to be eliminated entirely."

Is it realistic or reasonable, then, to attempt to place a monetary value on a university education? Surely an investment directed toward improving the minds of men can be expected to yield some return.

Can we expect, however, this investment to be amenable to 'balance-sheet' evaluation? Surely we owe ourselves more than to pervert an essential aspect of human endeavour to the level of a commercial profit-and-loss statement.

deadly Mirex a threat...

American pollutant in Canadian water

NEW YORK (LNS-CUP) — A New York State chemical manufacturer is dumping large amounts of Mirex, a known carcinogen, into Lake Ontario, effectively contaminating the lake's large fish population.

The Hooker Chemical Company - a subsidiary of Occidental Petroleum - claims it stopped production of the substance in 1967. But a recent New York Times investigation disclosed that over one pound per day of the highly dangerous substance - a huge amount for this chemical - flows into the lake through Hooker pipes.

Furthermore, a permit issued by the United States Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) actually allowed Hooker to dump thousands of pounds of other highly toxic chemicals (among them, PCB's) into the lake daily.

"To permit anything like this in a single day is incredible," one EPA scientist was quoted as saying. "I don't think I have ever seen a permit for this much junk. It has all the makings of a scandal."

The Times investigation also revealed that the State Department of Environmental Conservation was proceeding with plans to stock Lake Ontario with millions of salmon in spite of warnings about Mirex from scientists and others on their own staff.

Fish in Lake Ontario contain large amounts of Mirex, which then accumulates in humans who eat the contaminated fish. Yet the State's Environmental Protection Agency is also moving ahead with a $10 million hatchery to produce salmon and trout for sports fishing, slated to bring money to the region's sagging economy. The fish will be stored in the contaminated waters of Lake Ontario.

Mirex is a powerful chlorine compound, "the most persistent pesticide known," according to Bill Butler from the Environmental Defense Fund, a public interest law group which has been working on Mirex litigation for several years.

The pesticide was first introduced in 1946 to fight fire ants, an insect found in large numbers in the southern states. According to members of a co-operative Georgia farm, one of several community groups fighting the use of Mirex, the ants build high mounds and have a painful sting, but are relatively harmless.

Found to be carcinogenic in mice and rats, Mirex can degrade into

"Don't blame all of this pollution on us.....It's these stinking fish!"

Kepona, a highly toxic substance. Allied Chemical Co., which produced Kepona, is currently charged in a series of massive criminal and civil suits resulting from the pollution of Virginia waterways and workers' exposure to the chemical.

Allied also produced Mirex, but has pulled out of its production to avoid possible lawsuits stemming from the chemical's hazards. It sold its only Mirex plant in Mississippi to that state last winter for one dollar to get rid of it.

"The major problem with Mirex is its long term toxicity," said Butler. Poured onto ground corn-cob grits and mixed with soybean oil, Mirex is then sprayed by plane over 12 to 18 million acres of nine southern states.

"That's massive exposure," Butler told LNS. "It builds up in the food chain and gets into human food." Agricultural products from the south, including beef, which has also been found to contain Mirex, are shipped all over the United States.

From 40 to 50 percent of all samples taken from human tissues in the states using Mirex have shown the chemical to include "levels above one part per million, which is really astonishing," reports Butler. And the chemical hasn't prevented the spread of fire ants.

Meanwhile, Mirex continues to spill into Lake Ontario from the Hooker plant, and the company remains silent. "Mirex is a hot potato," said Jerry Wildenfeld, Hooker's director of environmental health, "and we are under strict orders to refer all inquiries to the public relations department."

The plant is reported to be storing 200,000 pounds of the chemical in its Niagara Falls plant, and though Hooker would like to get rid of it, no buyers have been found.

Now Hooker won't sell Mirex unless fully protected by an insurance company against possible damage suits and no insurance companies are interested.

"They can read the papers about Kepona as well as you or I," said Butler. "They know the Allied officials have already pleaded guilty to millions of dollars worth of civil fines."

The fire ant program has grown over the years to a political scandal, involving millions of taxpayers' dollars. "It's a patronage system," is how Butler describes it.

"It's a way of getting the money down to the districts of the senior committee chairmen of the House and Senate agriculture committees and the appropriations committees - the Talmadges, the Stennieses, the Eastlands. These guys are the old-line agricultural politicians that rise to power in the agriculture and appropriations committees and vote themselves money to get rid of fire ants."

"The local powers get on the fire ant committees in each county and the money goes for trucks and helicopters and planes. Some of the agriculture commissioners have a private air force and that is used to disseminate Mirex."

On Friday, September 3, the EPA announced a tentative settlement which will result in the cancellation of Mirex production at the end of the year in its present formulation, and in a two thirds diluted formulation by the end of next year. And not surprisingly, the House Appropriations Committee has already come up with a supplemental appropriation of half a million dollars to find an alternative to Mirex.

The Environmental Defense Fund, which has represented a number of southern residents against Mirex as well as several conservation groups, considers the EPA agreement a victory, although a compromise one.

"We're happy the EPA is getting rid of Mirex," Butler commented. "We're unhappy at the length of time of the phase out and we're unhappy at the amount of Mirex that can be used in the interval."

However, the problem of what to do about the long-lived chemical still remains. Mirex has already entered the food chain, and is present in more than twice the amount allowed by federal guidelines in the 27 million pounds of fish sold annually out of Lake Ontario.

Galbraith:

Modern economics is the handmaiden of politics

Press: As the technocracy undermines independence and sovereignty of elected officials, does democracy, which is founded on these principles, exist in the United States or is there just a pretense of it? And if you feel that it does exist, what offsets the highly concentrated political and social power of the technocrat?

Galbraith:

Well, first of all I would make a minor amendment. I wouldn't make any great distinction in this regard between the industrial countries. They all have large corporations. The United States is in some ways the only advanced case.

One always notices going to France and Germany the enormous effort to make a distinction between the development of French capitalism and German capitalism. I have a strong suspicion that the similarities are greater than the differences.

There's no doubt that the point is a valid one but that the supremacy of the state is increasingly challenged by the enormous power of the large organizations, which modern enterprise brings into existence for productive tasks. The thing that you should really marvel at, and I urge you all do, is that the economic instruction to which you are all subject, the marvelous textbooks to which you are all subordinate, all make the modern business enterprise the completely passive servant of the market and give it no organic position in the state whatsoever.

If you were ever disposed to direct slightly ascerbic questions to somebody, they should really be directed not to Galbraith, but rather at people who attempt to perpetuate that myth. And also, you might have in mind the importance for the corporation to maintain this image, this construction, one that pretends that the corporation is a powerless and passive instrument of the state.

"And students being what they are, will believe anything"

I would suppose that a good deal of the power of the modern corporation grows out of the fact that several hundred thousand, some million students, are instructed each year in the interesting notion that it has no power. And students being what they are, will believe anything.

Press:

I guess in your first reply you brought up something which is going to come out later in the interview, but we might as well deal with it since we've mentioned it, and that is, how do you feel about the role of the universities in the modern industrial state and especially the Economics Departments?

Galbraith:

Well, I certainly feel the Economics Departments are the servant of dominant interests... and also to some degree are the protection of the past. The bested interests of professors and what they learned as graduate students is something that is very high.

One of the reasons that we have this enchanting combination of inflation and unemployment in the industrial countries is that the economics profession has been very reluctant to move on from the ordered conservatism of the old Keynesian structure which assumed that you could do everything by monetary and fiscal policy, on to more controversial instruments of economic policy such as politicians are forced to use... income controls, price controls. I don't think it's possible to run a modern economy without some kind of an income policy and some kind of restraints on corporate pricing. But then recent Economics has been very reluctant to accept that idea.

Press:

How would you go about changing something as vastly entrenched as the discipline of Economics?

Galbraith:

You couldn't have asked a question to which I've given more thought in my life. I never devised a formula that seemed to me to be better than to write books that would be more commonly read than the books that I'm seeking to refute, and to get them in cheap paperback editions so they don't strain students' budgets, and I'm not sure there is any other device. I know of no way to revise the economics curriculum; I usually manage a couple of lectures every year at the Harvard elementary course but I always think that it does about as much to undo the year-long teaching of my colleagues as can be accomplished in two lectures.

Press: Are you saying, Mr. Galbraith, that Economics isn't a science?

Galbraith:

Certainly not, it's the handmaiden of politics.

Press:

I'm interested in controls, and one of the things that worries me most about Canada's controls is the fact that the direct capital that's flowing into Canada has decreased from something like 250 million dollars in 1975 down to 15 million dollars in 1976. I wondered if you could tell us how you feel about the controls in Canada?

Galbraith:

As a former Canadian, of course, I'm allowed to speak frankly. And particularly here at this fine Presbyterian institution. There one has a fine example of the Presbyterian ethic in Canada... either one is worried about too much capital coming in and taking over Canada or too little capital flowing in and not doing enough for Canada. You couldn't have a more marvelous example of the Calvinist instinct for looking on the wrong side of all issues, could you?

But I don't think it's possible to run a modern economy without controls. I know of all the controversy they're arousing in Canada, but I had a discussion of this with Mr. Simon Reisman the other day, and when I said to him, "Mr. Reisman, would you take off the controls after you've condemned them from hell to break-fast," he hedged, and then he hedged some more, and when he finished answering the question, no one could possibly have said what his answer was, but it was evident he didn't want to come out and say they should be removed in spite of all these objections to them.

The same thing is true in Britain; everybody sees the fault but nobody an empirical fact that this is no longer the main problem. If you take archetypal big oligopoly, such as the automobile business, we're not terribly concerned with the fact that it underpays its workers. Unions can take care of that, and we're not terribly concerned with the inadequate supply or even the excessive cost of automobiles.

Some of the other things that are problems, such as the control of emissions and things of that sort, the society can also take care of.

By contrast, in those parts of the economy where there isn't power, where there isn't power over the prices, and power in relation to the labour supply, and there isn't power in relation to the consumer persuasion; where there isn't access to technology; where there is dependence on borrowed capital, we have gross inadequacies of which housing is the major example. No industrial country is satisfied with its housing; no industrial country is satisfied with its health care; no industrial country is fully satisfied with its urban services.

would ever want to open the British wage and price movements to the unrestrained influence of the market again. I would be reluctant to think that controls have very much to do with the inflow or outflow of capital.

Press:

Do you like the way that they have been implemented in Canada?

Galbraith:

This gets down to a level of detail in which I'm uneasy about answering this; it would be to some degree irresponsible. I haven't looked into the details of the administration perhaps to the extent that I should. I ran them in the United States in World War II, and this of course is a very high standard for any other country to meet.

Press:

You said in Economics and the Public Purpose, that new socialism which you distinguish from old socialism, will be compelled by circumstances — those of economic trends. I wonder if you could clarify why it will be compelled, and what will compel the socialism?

Galbraith:

The old vision of socialism had to do with monopoly and exploitation: exploitation of the consumer, exploitation of the labour force; producing too little at too high a price, paying too little.

I argue both as an analytical and as by the debates so far. I rather enjoyed that sound going off. However, I support the Democratic ticket. We put too much emphasis on the candidates themselves.

On the whole, Governor Carter will bring in the sort of modern public establishment — people who believe that government is an affirmative force, and have a fairly modern view of economic management — and who are not organically opposed to the notion of the steps that might be taken as you approach full employment, we would have an end to the appalling eighteenth century men like Simon Greenspan, and they would return to the private enterprise for which they were intended.

Press:

Do you really find a difference between the economic advice given to the Republicans and that given to the Democrats?

Galbraith:

No question about it. The Democrats and the Republicans in turn tend to turn to the corporate and big-business community, and we tend to turn to people who have a slightly more critical view of that community.

Press:

As part of his campaign, President Ford has been bragging about the economic upswing in the States.

Galbraith:

It's an absolutely outrageous statement. First of all, the upswing isn't very strong, unemployment's going up; inflation's going up.

This is something I don't understand: I don't understand why the Democrats don't make more of the notion. People are so simple-minded that they'll vote only on what the situation is 5 minutes before the election rather than looking at the whole record.

Press:

What is President Ford basing this on, that there is an upswing in the States?

Galbraith:

He hasn't got very much else to talk about. He can't talk about honesty in government.

Press:

I'd like to hear your response to what's going on right now in Thailand. Do you think there's going to be a shift in the balance of power?

Galbraith:

Oh God, I think it's sad. I'd hate to see them implement a military government. Again, it may seem to be partly from the tendency for people who have overthrown military governments to then take too much pleasure in fighting each other. The former Prime Minister is a very close personal friend of mine, and in fact he was visiting me in Vermont this summer. A very great man. That's just too bad.

Press:

Talking about governments again, I think with the size of corporations now, being at the multi-national level, isn't it really world-regulation that's required now, rather than just merely national?

Galbraith:

No. Well, it may be so, but I think you can accomplish most by national regulation. Most, as a practical matter, most of the things which you want a big corporation to do, you can do by national regulation anyway. I do not believe that the fact that the firm is multi-national means that you're much weakened by national regulation.

The foreign firm coming in to another country doesn't come with greater strength than the local corporations, and very often, sometimes, politically, is somewhat more vulnerable than the still self-national regulation.

For example, I think that the fact that the Canadian government is in a better position today to regulate General Motors than it was at year ago to regulate Canadian Pacific Railway.

Press:

Perhaps you could talk about anti-trust legislation and why that wouldn't do more towards controlling large companies than the admittedly difficult problem of monitoring profits?

"Anti-Trust Laws - the economists equivalent of sexual self abuse"

Galbraith:

Well, I regard the anti-trust legislation as the last resort of the vacant mind. When an American liberal can think of nothing else, and when he's exhausted the conversation, and he knows he must come up with an affirmative programme he says, "Let's enforce the anti-trust laws."

The anti-trust laws were put in the statute books in 1890. That was 86 years ago. The fact that nothing has happened yet is an indication that nothing is ever going to happen with those things. They are the great sink pit for liberal emotion. They're also marvelously, indubitably, conservative in the sense that all they would do anyway would be to recreate the transformation of a monopoly into an oligopoly, or an oligopoly into slightly more of an oligopoly.

So one thing I would counsel everybody is never whatever else your errors in life, invest any emotional energy in the enforcement of the Combine Act and the Anti-Trust Laws. That's the economist's equivalent of sexual self-abuse.

Han Ebbelaar and Alexandra Radius of the Dutch National Ballet which will be appearing at the Grand Theatre next Monday and Tuesday. The company is one of the most talented up-and-coming troupes in the world.

Dutch National Ballet: a virtuoso company

When the renowned Dutch National Ballet made its North American debut in Toronto eighteen months ago, performances drew all major Eastern critics.

Clive Barnes of the New York Times wrote that the Dutch National Ballet is "A major company". Renate Strauss, writing for the Buffalo Evening News, said "To see this company in action is an amazing experience. Artistic Director Rudi van Dantzig and his colleagues have created a ballet company that is nothing short of amazing."

Moreover, the Evening News went on to say that "Just about everyone is a virtuoso who is exciting whether performing a solo or dancing in the ensemble. The performance style is clean, razor-sharp, with a beautiful awareness of ensemble, and yet individuality emerges". In this way J. Sergei Sawchyn of Cantour believes the Dutch National Ballet is very similar to the Royal Winnipeg Ballet.

On the evenings of Monday, October 25 and Tuesday, October 26 the Grand Theatre will host this internationally famous company. Kingston is the second stop on the Dutch National Ballet's first North American tour.

The performance will consist of four works. The first is Van Manen's Metaphors. Metaphors is a play of movements based on theme of reflection and duplication. The structure of the choreography is thus determined by the many symmetrical patterns for the two groups, each group consisting of one or more dancers. Surrounded by an ensemble that is often very vital, two couples set the usually thoughtful mood. The changing of the groups is always characterized by the exchange of a theme from one group to the other one, achieving throughout one continuous flow of movement.

The pattern of relationships also displays shifts. The original mixed couples are dissolved, resulting in two homogeneous duets that are the eye-catchers of this ballet. The form of the male duet is especially remarkable as many of its motifs have been borrowed from the classical pas de deux for a ballerina and her partner. It is, specifically, by the use of lifts that this dance for two men acquired metaphorically the character of a relationship in which both partners assist and support each other. This also characterizes the duet for the two women, who go on holding hands. The twofold unity formed by the women remains in the foursome when later the men join them.

Thus, the original couple formation results in its duplication. But the emphasis on the former does not imply that erotic drives are laid bare, for Metaphors is above all a lithe, often sportive ballet which displays playful dance themes in a tight, geometric composition. The ballet is performed to the music of Daniel-Lesur (Variations pour Piano et Orchestra a Cordes, 1943).

The second work is a new piece by Toer van Schayk. The general atmosphere of his choreographic work is gloomy, as they often display an inhospitable world that is doomed by the tendencies of destruction, especially self-destruction, of its inhabitants. The desperate undertones are related to the signals given by the ballets of Rudi van Dantzig, with whom Van Schayk has always worked in close connection as his favourite stage designer. Van Schayk's ballets often reflect the withdrawal in isolation of individuals who are driven by some sacred duty to communication, but yield in advance to the doom of failure. The choreography, therefore often points to the different stylizations of diverse conventions, not without a sense of humour. The ballet is danced to the music of Arnold Spohr.

The third piece of the evening is Hans van Manen's famous Twilight. Van Manen explores in his duet the nature and possibilities of movements by a dancer who has prepared her feet not with point shoes, but with high-heeled pumps. These keep her feet in the intermediate position of being neither flat nor on points and give her dancing an unusual quality of piercing and flashing sharpness, but avoiding any vulgarity one might expect. However, they also limit the range of her movements, notably all kinds of jumps.

In the first part both dancers mainly circle around each other, expressing the dialogue character of this duet by the way they keep looking at each other. It commences almost in meditation, with thoughtful movements for the woman. From then on, however, the frame of mind changes constantly, caused by the fact that there is always one who imitates the other, or who tries to seduce or challenge the partner.

The emotional interchange becomes ever more explosive, irritations creep in, and, finally, the woman removes her pumps.

Epitaph, by Rudi van Dantzig, the finale, is above all a ballet of decay and disease. In spite of the two brides dressed in white - who, as symbols of new life, hopefully wander through the ballet and also engage in a sourly humorous waltz - the outcome has been established from the beginning. Even the two young men whom they lead to the altar shrivel up at their feet during their journey. And the dancers trapped in coffins, as well as the large black box that finally swallows up the ensemble, which up to that moment has given its commentary as a lamenting group of ghosts, are not any more reasons for optimism. Epitaph is performed to the music of Gyorgy Ligeti (Atmospheres and Volumina), whose genius "sped and spun through '2001: A SPACE ODYSSEY'".

The Dutch National Ballet is the critics' choice. Tickets, at reduced prices for students ($4.50, $5.50, $6.50), are available OFFICE, John Deutsch University Centre - 547-6194, or from the GRAND THEATRE at 218 Princess Street. For more information contact the Performing Arts Office - 547-5786.

Queen's ready for York

On Tuesday evening, at West Campus, the Queen's rugby team took on a fit and physical team from the Royal Military Academy at Sandhurst, England, who are in Canada on a three game tour, as guests of R.M.C. The Gaels emerged as winners, 14-3 extending their season's winning streak to four games.

The game was characterized by physical, rough forward play, and strong running from the backs. The match was the hardest that Queen's has played this season, and it was thought that for several Queen's players, the game represented their best individual efforts.

Sandhurst opened the scoring early when a penalty cost the Gaels three quick points. Queen's quickly answered with a try from Stuart Slater, and a drop-goal by vice-captain Nigel Costelloe. Queen's lead at the half, 7-3.

The game continued to get rougher, in the second half, and the ball traded ends of the field often, until Reid Drury tore through the Sandhurst defence, for an insurance try, which sapped the strength and spirit from the visiting side.

The game was excellent for Queen's to prepare for their weekend encounter with York University, this Saturday. Queen's will be hosting the Yeomen, who edged them in the OUA A finals last year. The game represents a "must-win" contest for Queen's in their bid for the Championship this year. The league standings are so tight this year, that all the remaining games are still very important, in spite of their 4-0-1 record thus far. Saturday's match is the last home game of the regular season, commencing at 2:00 P.M. at the West Campus field. Be sure not to miss this year's rematch.

Bews News

by Mike Gouinlock

In the past two years, abuse of Men's Intramural referees in the majority of sports has been commonplace. This year has been no exception.

The number of teams which take out their own ineptitude on the officials is growing. Just last week one flag football referee had a ball rifled at him when a call went against one player. Berating and intimidating officials so that the next call might go your way may be an acceptable practice in professional baseball or hockey, but it is inexcusable in Bews.

The Intramural referees are not professional. They do not make the right calls all the time, yet without them there would be no Bews at all.

Most sports are looking for more officials so if you think that the officiating is bad, try volunteering your own services. It's a lot more difficult than you think. The referees are there so that the system will

With new attitude, how far can they go?

by Brian Clarke

Questions are being asked about the fate of the Queen's University Golden Gaels under the guidance of first-year basketball coach, Pete Smith this season.

Can the American import get the Gaels back on the road to success after their poor showing in recent years?

Smith believes he can, and has fashioned a weapon for the Gaels to use against their Ontario University Athletic Association competition.

playoffs the goal

"It's hard to make any predictions about the season," said coach Smith. "The only long range goal we have is of making the playoffs. Other than that we will take each game as it comes."

The Queen's lineup looks fairly balanced in its ratio of newcomers to veterans this year, but as Coach Smith said, "some of the experience our veterans have doesn't count for too much."

A look at the roster shows that Smith has broken down his 15-man squad into five centres, six forwards, and four guards.

Playing the post, at centre, will be four experienced Gaels and one new player. Three-year veteran Andy Bonniwell, standing 6'5" and 200 pounds brings the most experience to the position. Dave Dempster, Henry Garbary, and Lorens Paulsen have each been around for two years, while Dave Calnan is playing his first.

Two of the Gaels' six players assigned the forward position, Kim Carlton and Steve Simmons, are the only freshmen on the team. Carlton is from Dundas, while Simmons, a graduate of Kingston's Frontenac Secondary School brings to the team some local talent. Other forwards are Mike Flenniken, Bruce Nickel, Sean Pritchard, and team captain Derek Sinnard.

At guard the Gaels will have Robert Cooney, Peter Lainey, Stephen Mecredy, and Rob Smart. None of these players are newcomers to Queen's, making it as position with plenty of experience. However, one problem has already arisen. Mecredy suffered torn ligaments and a sprained ankle during practice and will not play for some time.

Heightwise, only two of the Gaels, Cooney and Lainey are under six feet. The tallest player on the team is Paulsen at 6'6". He also carries the most weight with 225 pounds.

Coach Smith says he intends to substitute freely and play all his players. "It's going to be in and out, in and out," said Smith. "We want to run, run, run, the opposition until they're too tired to stand on their feet."

Defensively, the Gaels, according to Smith, will play with a pressure defence most of the time. "If we can afford to," said Smith, "we'll use it the whole game."

Rebounding is another area of the game where Smith doesn't foresee any big problems. "I think we have good rebounding," said Smith. There seems to be lots of strength on the team.

One concern which Smith does have is that of substituting freely. "I've never had a team that I could substitute freely with and get away with it," said Smith. "But I'm going to try this time."

This year's Gaels seem to have a lot more going for them than any Queen's basketball team has had in a long time, even their attitude is praised by Coach Smith.

"For our game with Bishop's, we're only given enough money by Queen's to send 12 guys," said Smith

Elitist intramurals

Physical fitness is an important factor in the development of mental health. Perhaps no one group of society is more aware of this than the university student, the college boy-girl of 21 who is at the twilight of an active sports life.

But here at Queen's there seems to be an emphasis on professionalism within the intramural program which results in the majority of this campus remaining UNINVOLVED in competitive sport. This is to the detriment of the average student, and also an elitism which emphasizes the wrong values within university amateur sports.

My basic point is this: when an intramural hockey team (let's use Arts '77 as an example) decides to hold tryouts to choose who does and doesn't play, and of the 60 students who express an interest in playing hockey, only 20 make the line-up, then this is unfair discrimination. What kind of values are our intramural programs stressing: physical fitness, or winning with the best only?

Queen's prides itself upon its athletic program, and at the semi-professional level the university does a good job in providing the opportunity for a player's development. But at the amateur level the programs carried on by this university suck wind.

When the majority of the campus can only achieve an outlet for its desire of fitness by lining up for an hour at 7:30 in the hopes of reserving a squash court, or else by running around a track which causes shin-splints, then the state of sports at Queen's is really sad! Athletic facilities outside the university are sparse, and my student fees, which are spent upon programs within the university, are not providing me with the services for which I paid. This emphasis upon professionalism and discrimination in intramurals should not exist within an educational center which claims to have a healthy athletic program.

Solutions? I realize that this is the age of financial constraints, and with the sheer size of Queen's it is hard to include all students in an intramural program. But improvements can still be made. First, the team structures should be re-organized. Arts '77, for example, is a bulk of some 1500 students. How many of that 1500 can really get involved with the system of tryouts for teams?

The division of teams by years should be abolished, and clubs created instead based upon each student's subject of interest. Hence, Arts '77 could be filtered down into History '77, English '77, etc. This would give more people a chance to participate in intramurals, as well as providing the opportunity for the student to get together with his friends in the same field of study. The engineering faculty already follows this plan very successfully as their teams are divided into civil engineering, electrical, etc. rather than just Engineering '78.

This creation of teams would be costly, one could argue. But isn't each student already paying substantial athletic fees, and the bulk of the student body has never had a chance to play on an intramural team? Could plays edwards funds not be allocated towards a badly needed re-organization of the intramural program?

If not, then I think students who "don't make the team" should get a portion of their athletic payments refunded, if Queen's feels the present system of discrimination is the only possible way to run an intramural program. Or could the donations from the next 5 kind old ladies who wish to benefit the university not be used towards the creation of an intramural expansion fund?

Come on, Queen's. Let's end elitism and professionalism at the intramural level, and let students become athletically involved.

"We've got 15 on the team, and the players came to me and said that everybody wanted to chip in so that the other three could go."

Queen's University students and fans of the team will get a chance to see the Gaels scrimmaging, demonstrating their offense and defense, and even answering questions this Tuesday when they hold a "Meet the Gaels Night" starting at 9 p.m. in Bartlett Gym. It's an opportunity that no one who intends to support Queen's rise to success in the OUA A this year should miss.

Echeverria to UN?

Mexico's outgoing president Luis Echeverria, has been formally entered as a possible candidate for the post of U.N. secretary-general Kurt Wulheim of Austria, the present incumbent, has announced his willingness to serve another term after his term is up at the end of the year.

Mr. Echeverria steps down from his office on Dec. 1, and has shown his interest in the post for a long time. China has also let it be known that they would prefer a Third World diplomat as secretary-general of the U.N. The election can take place any time before the current session ending Dec. 21.

Korean smugglers

The entire North Korean diplomatic staff has been told to leave Norway, who has accused them of smuggling liquor and cigarettes. They are able to get the goods duty-free, and then sell them to Norwegians. One diplomat is suspected by Norwegian police of offering hashish for sale.

In Denmark, the police uncovered a narcotics network said to have used the North Korean diplomatic bags to smuggle over 300 pounds of hashish into Denmark. Denmark has asked for the recall of the North Korean ambassador and his staff.

The diplomats in Norway were accused of selling 4,000 bottles and 140,000 cigarettes to Norwegians.

Lebanon peace plan

President Anwar Sadat of Egypt submitted a programme to end the Lebanese civil war to an Arab summit meeting in Riyadh. The meeting was composed of leaders from Saudi Arabia, Syria, Lebanon, Kuwait and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Sources said the proposal called for an immediate halt to hostilities and a political discussion by all parties involved. Also suggested was the use of an Arab peace-keeping army to enforce and maintain a ceasefire.

Quebec elections

Premier Robert Bourassa called a Quebec election for November 15th on Monday. The announcement was made by means of video-cassette recording previously distributed to T.V. stations throughout Quebec. According to Mr. Bourassa the purpose of the election is to involve all Quebecers with the decisions taken in the patriation of Canada's constitution.

In his three minute tape, Mr. Bourassa stated that the public debate generated by the election will allow Quebecers to "re-evaluate the equilibrium of the social groups in our society", and referred to labour unions in particular.

However, Mr. Bourassa was also influenced by the fact that Liberal strategists believe the Liberals can win once again and assure themselves of another five years in power. This is important as the Liberal popularity has been slowly eroding. The Liberals have had their majority decreased to 98 seats from 102 since the last election.

No fall election

Premier William Davis said Monday that Ontario would not have an election before next spring unless it is forced on the minority Government by the combined opposition parties. Mr. Davis said he had no intention of finding an artificial excuse to hold an election at a time when his party has had an improved showing in the public opinion polls.

The Liberals have warned that they will not support the Government just to avoid an election. Dr. Smith, the Liberal leader attributes his personal unpopularity to his being new and therefore unknown, while Mr. Lewis concluded the recent polls showed "the total decline" of the Liberals.

More prizes

The Nobel Prizes for Chemistry and Physics were announced on Monday

by the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences. William Lipscomb of the United States won the chemistry prize for his studies of boranes (compounds of boron and hydrogen) and chemical bonding. The physics awards is being shared by Burton Richter and Samuel Ting, also Americans. These two men have made discoveries about J particles, small components of matter, smaller than atoms and their nuclei.

Tory Victory

After the federal by-election in the riding of Ottawa-Carleton last Monday, the Conservative candidate, Jean Pigott, was declared victor over the Liberal candidate, Henri Rocque. This was the first time the Liberals have lost this riding in over ninety years.

The by-election was called to fill the empty seat left behind by John Turner who resigned from politics last year. The major issues in the election were bilingualism and wage and price controls.

Strike reprisals

Many employees across the country are now facing reprisals and reprimands after joining in the day of protest on October 14. In Calgary civic employees are being docked a day's pay while in Vancouver certain postal workers are being suspended. Closer to home, Inco Ltd. of Sudbury is suing the Steelworkers union for reimbursement of losses caused by the one-day shutdown of their plant. Assorted other companies are suspending workers for a day, filing grievances against their workers' unions, or just putting reprimands in the files of those workers who participated in the strike.

Oddments

A deadly radioactive cloud was reported drifting toward Vienna ORF, Austria's state-owned radio, sent out a documentary on an accident in an atomic power station which was so realistic that firemen rushed to their stations and worried citizens jammed the police telephone switchboards. The report was intended to demonstrate what might happen if an accident ever did occur at Austria's first nuclear power station now being built at Zwentendorf, west of Vienna.

Saudi Arabia is planning a new approach to its water shortage problem. A French engineering firm is going to try towing an iceberg from the frigid waters of the Antarctic to the warm waters off the coast of Saudi Arabia. The ideal iceberg would be a rectangular block (for stability) about a mile long, 900 yards wide and 750 yards deep. Hopefully not too much of it would melt during the 5,000 mile, about eight month long, trip. The iceberg would also have to be sliced up with hot cables to pass through the Straits of Bab al Mandab, a mere 120 feet in depth

Minister "can't say" but "weather's not good"

Tuition increases not definite - yet

by Terry Collins

The Minister of Colleges and Universities, Dr. Harry Parrott declined to confirm a report issued by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) that tuition fees would rise by $100 for the 1977-78 academic year.

Harry Parrott

Dr. Parrott said that when any increases are made public "the announcement will be a very formal one," and indicated that it will probably be made at a news conference sometime soon.

The minister had told an audience at Seneca College on October 13 that he would like to be able to inform students of the Ontario Cabinet's decision on tuition fees by October 28. However, Dr. Parrott told the Journal that his ministry "won't be done by the 28th." He said that, "Every ministry has to be set" in the near future, meaning that university funding for the next year will soon be finalized. "Fees are an integral part of university funding, you can't talk about university funding without talking about fees," said Dr. Parrott.

When asked about a report that the Cabinet would be considering tuition fees on Wednesday, October 22, Dr. Parrott said, "We are considering university funding all the time, but I can't say anything." Later he explained that, "Any comment made now would be a disservice" to all concerned.

In a news release last Monday, the OFS said they had learned from "informed sources within the Ministry of Colleges and Universities," that a $100 increase in tuition was expected to be announced on or by October 28. When asked where the OFS was getting their information, Dr. Parrott chuckled, "where they get all their information." He went on to say that the tuition fee question "is really up in the air," and he dismissed the OFS report as "speculation." "You'll read it in the papers like everyone else," has been Dr. Parrott's response to the recent tuition increase rumours.

Nevertheless, Dr. Parrott told the Journal, "when you're talking about fees, the weather's not too good down here."

When asked about the size of a possible fee increase last summer, Dr. Parrott told the Journal that he would like to see tuition pegged at roughly 70 percent of the total cost of a university education. At present tuition fees in the province are generally set at $600 and cover roughly 16 percent of the total cost.

Who's Where listing

by Barbara Ashdown

Each year the Who's Where omits several local phone numbers and addresses. This year, however, 2000 Queen's students will find blanks beside their names. According to the Registrar's Record Office, the problem arose in this year's publication due to a "misunderstanding" which occurred between their office, the University Information System and the Who's Where staff.

Mr. George Hammond said that at the time of registration two years ago, the Record's Office used "Biographical Confirmation Sheets," which brought information forward from the previous year, and made them available to students for corrections. The University Information System also used a magnetic tape at this time to record student biographical information. In 1975-76, the Record's Office decided to save keypunch time and make it optional to bring forward the previous year's information on the Confirmation Sheets and on the magnetic tape.

At the time, they expected the publication date for the Who's Where to be October 8, 1976. Due to printing deadlines, the Who's Where staff informed the Record's Office last February that the due date must be moved to October 4. The Record's Office, pressed for time, neglected to use the optional system and decided to bring forward all the previous year's data. Unfortunately the University Information System, unaware of the change, did not bring forward any of the local addresses or phone numbers from 1975. An incomplete tape was sent to the Who's Where staff who, having given students the opportunity to check their listings, sent the tape to Ottawa for typesetting. Hence the blank spaces. Those who did not have a change of address or phone number from last year were therefore omitted.

A supplementary listing from a

Miller to seek re-election

'Accept, don't condemn' us for gobbling up all houses

by Maben Smith

Lois Miller has announced her intention to seek re-election as alderwoman for Sydenham Ward in the municipal elections this December. Sydenham Ward, which affects most of Queen's students, includes the area bounded by Johnson Street and the waterfront, and as far west as Centre and MacDonnell Streets.

Miss Miller feels her experience on City Council to date has been both enjoyable and rewarding, even though at times quite frustrating. Alderwoman Miller outlines, especially with respect to the renovation, modernization projects presently being carried out. She stresses the need both for preservation of historic properties and the maintenance of a balance life style. In this area, Miss Miller feels Kingston has ample opportunity.

Alderwoman Miller is chairperson of the city's Housing Sub-committee, which has just recently released the Kingston Housing Policy Study (Journal, Oct. 22). The report, she feels, bears out what has been said for some time with respect to student housing. The present situation, that of Queen's students successfully obtaining the majority of housing in revised tape will be published in the Journal of November 12. Watch the Journal for times and place to check your listing if you were omitted or incorrectly listed.

the immediate vicinity, must be accepted and dealt with, not condemned. The situation must be realistically addressed, thus allowing both the University and the City to review possible ways of improving housing facilities.

One way, Alderwoman Miller feels, is to examine the possibilities of a non-profit housing corporation which would provide housing for students, as well as for seniors and low-income families. She feels the definite need for a balance of occupants in the Ward. Perhaps presently the amenities provided by the City are underused, with schools as much as one-third empty.

One particular concern of the alderwoman is the relation between students and landlords. Her work, she feels, has helped to improve this, but there remains a substantial gap that must be overcome. Both landlords and students have shown interest in the maintenance of the properties, although quite often not enough. The blame lies not only with the landlord, but with students who either exert little pressure on their landlord for improvements, or those who care little for the condition of their property, often giving it, as well as the neighbourhood, an appearance that is most unbecoming.

Alderwoman Lois Miller sees possible action in City Council next year dealing with these related problems.

More jobs

Kingston's unemployment rate, which has been decreasing during this third quarter of 1976, is expected to continue decreasing until the end of the year, but not so quickly. 22.2 percent of Kingston businesses polled by Manpower Temporary Services forecast a slight increase in their hiring. Only 11.1 percent of Kingston companies expect a small decrease in their staff numbers during the final quarter of this year.

Channelization

City Planning Board voted Tuesday to recommend to City Council that the Little Cataraqui Creek not have its east branch channelled. In the first place no extra land would be made available for building if the water was channelled. Then the effects of this on the downstream are not known. Also this would mean that the city would have to build a one million dollar holding tank to contain the sewage overflows which occasionally occur from the north end pumping station. The swamp areas which now absorb and filter out the sewage during periods of overflow would all disappear if the plans for channelization were carried out. City Council will probably debate this issue at its next meeting this month.

Quality care

The Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation has made a number of recommendations to Kingston General Hospital to help them improve the quality of their services. Among the moves suggested were the establishment of nursing and medical audit committees, checks on the capabilities of nurses working on specialized tasks, the recording of the exact amounts of time patients spend in the emergency department and of the verification of all operations in writing, including specifications of the exact extent of all operations. Doctors applying for renewals of their staff positions should also have to furnish evidence that they have in some way received continuing education.

The hospital is working on a format to check the quality of care that it provides. A committee has been formed to review all deaths in the hospital and, after analyzing reports on medical care, to suggest education programs for the staff.

Rowhousing

Ontario Housing Corporation is proposing to construct 88 rowhousing units at Bath road and Portsmouth Avenue. Planning board is going to hold a public meeting in the area on November 2, since protest from local residents is expected.

34 four-bedroom and 54 three-bedroom condominiums would be built on a nine acre site. The chief cause of opposition to the development is the plan to direct traffic from this development out through an already settled low-density residential area.

OFS matters to youth

That the OFS is a weak organization and "can no longer be regarded as a spokesman for the average college or university student" is a position the Journal has held for some time. Unfortunately, the paper presently circulating on Campus, Youth Matters, published by the Progressive Conservative Youth, has called on Western University students to vote this week against membership in the OFS, a suggestion which we find extreme.

Certainly the OFS could use some new direction. We, too, are tired of the importance given by the OFS to minority groups, which it does not represent such as organized labor, and migrant workers. But who runs the OFS? Policy decisions are, in large measure, determined by the representatives to the OFS from the individual campuses. The representatives have the option to change the executive and the field workers who are the ones who decide the daily direction of the OFS effort.

If the membership feels its interests are not being represented then the member colleges and universities have the option to clean it out. By opting out of the OFS Western students will forfeit their vote for changing the OFS (if they want to change at all).

Gradually, perhaps imperceptibly, the universities and colleges in Ontario are replacing their representatives to OFS with relative moderates. At the last OFS meeting, four of the largest universities in this province, including Queen's, voted against student endorsement of the CLC 'Day of Protest'. That three OFS representatives should vote against solidarity with organized labour is an encouraging indication that the ilk of student being sent to such conferences is, perhaps, changing.

These representatives to the OFS are chosen by the respective student administrative councils of the universities in Ontario. If the P.C. Youth wish to change the OFS, they should begin at the first level. Encouragement of student positions on campus is the only democratic and responsible way for moderates to shape reform in that organization. Calling for Western withdrawal from the OFS is neither well-reasoned nor responsible. If the majority of Western students feel the same as those quoted by Youth Matters, they should place pressure on their student council to send a true representative to the OFS caucus.

Good book otherwise The classic constraint

It is unfortunate that such a great problem as the omission of roughly 2000 local addresses and telephone numbers should have diminished what we consider to be the best Who's Where in that book's short history; it is by far the most informative and attractive (front cover excepted). In addition, and refreshingly, the book this year generated enough money to cover its costs.

As disturbing as it was to see the omission, it was equally disturbing to see what short fuses some students have. We refer particularly to the letters we received shortly after distribution of the book commenced. "Someone had better do some fast talking," began one outraged correspondent.

There were four days for students to check their listings. A half page advertisement publicizing the times and place to do so was carried in the Journal of 11,000 people listed, few persons used this opportunity.

Unfortunately, there was no real reason for most students to believe they should check, particularly those who made no changes from last year in their local address or telephone number during registration. These, of course were primarily the people omitted by the administration's computer program which produces the typesetting tape used by Who's Where. In a special supplement on November 12, the Queen's Journal will publish the listing of all those omitted. If you were omitted or listed incorrectly watch the Journal for the times and place to check.

Those less familiar with the more peculiar traditions of Queen's might well expect to see place names, streets and codes when they look at the new Queen's Directories. We at Queen's, however, being well versed in construction delays find nothing irregular about errant piles of blocks bearing the inscription, "Queen's Directory" on bronzed aluminum. Indeed, they are examples of the simplicity of classic design, more primitive than the wheel. Do these structures bear testament to the future expansion of Queen's University, or the lack thereof? Perhaps the administration is sincerely trying to convince visitors that financial constraints affect even the most paltry of structures on campus. Conceivably the future does not auger well for this institution when all we see in the Directory is garbage.

Queen's loses opportunity for instructional development

by Denis Champagne

An experimental program offered through the Queen's Department of Extension at Collins Bay Institution this summer was termed a 'great success' in the institution's inmate publication.

The program consisted of a six week course in Politics 130 taught by Mr. Peter Snow a senior graduate student in the Department of Political Studies. Ten inmates participated and all were very successful, according to Mr. Snow. Financial constraints may terminate the continuation of programs such as these, he stated, unless something is done to change the present financial procedures involved.

Elaborating, Mr. Snow said, approximately $4,000 of the $5,000 which Collins Bay had allocated for the program was used. This consisted of the payment of a stipend to Mr. Snow of $1,900, $1,200 in tuition fees and approximately $600 for books, xeroxing and additional costs incurred by the department of extension.

Queen's received two B.U.'s or $6,000 for the program from the provincial government, plus $1,200 in tuition fees and all costs were covered, he said. Mr. Snow feels that perhaps a different fiscal arrangement could be arrived at reflecting that of regular Queen's courses.

His proposal consists of the university absorbing the miscellaneous costs and the stipend. Under this arrangement, he stated, a teaching methods; another on where to find information on teaching and lastly on how to hold workshops. The success of the workshops is hard to gauge since it is a case of "preaching to the converted", said Dr. Parrett. Only those who are already interested turn up.

The budget of OUPID is $500,000 this year but will be only $350,000 next year and $300,000 the following year. After 1978 OUPID is to be phased out. Dr. Parrett is working for the continuation of the programme with an increased budget, since he feels the goals of OUPID will not be achieved by the end of 1978.

Dr. Parrett did not attach great importance to the role of students. Although he felt that students now have a more effective voice than earlier, they also have many other commitments, and do not have much time to spend working on instructional development programmes.

This summer at Queen's, however, a committee of students was set up to investigate this area. The committee is still meeting and hopes to publish a report shortly. It will deal with the problem of better teaching in conflict with financial constraints and will discuss the importance of evaluation.

OUPID has run many workshops with the goal of giving faculty members the opportunity to learn about teaching. There have been three types of workshops. One type has concentrated on discussing penitentiary with a similar budget could afford approximately thirty six individual courses at $120 per course with extra for books. The university would gain close to $22,000 in B.U.'s, an additional $4,320 in tuition fees and after costs would arrive at a healthy profit.

There would be several benefits resulting from an expansion of this program, the senior graduate student stated. He found his students to be, "bright and inquisitive with a lot of drive to perform," and felt this teaching experience combined with the financial assistance of a stipend would be of a substantial benefit to fellow graduate students.

"The design of an educational program with real social consequences," he continued, "would achieve additional prestige for Queen's akin to that achieved by its establishment of the legal aid program and free tuition for the old." A program such as this combined with correspondence courses and university attendance would enable inmates to pursue degree programs and not simply interest courses which are easily attainable by correspondence, he said.

Professors Berman and Leys and Mr. Phil Wood and Mr. Snow, both senior graduate students, are offering a second year level course in politics in Collins Bay in the fall and winter terms this year. The institution is paying tuition, books and miscellaneous costs, Queen's is receiving approximately $6,000 in B.U.'s and $1,200 in tuition fees and the teaching staff have volunteered their joint services, according to Mr. Snow.

The inability of the penitentiary to secure sufficient funds for this purpose from the federal government, according to Mr. Snow, has necessitated the volunteering of services by the teaching staff in order to continue the program throughout the winter months.

With the numerous penal institutions in this area, Mr. Snow said, there is a good possibility of finding forty to fifty interested, capable students and Queen's is in the ideal location to take advantage of this dual learning experience for both inmates and teaching staff. The only hindrance to this program, in his opinion, is the present financial set up.

Violence, politics and state: Speakers take up issues

Three major speakers will present their views on the theme of "Violence, Politics and the State" on Monday, November 1st, Robin Bourne, the Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of the Solicitor General will speak on Violence and Political Authority.

Mr. Bourne is a retired Canadian Armed Forces Colonel in the Federal Government. His particular responsibility in the Department of the Solicitor General is Police and Security. In this capacity he advises the government on Internal Security, Police Policy and Planning, and he directs the activities of the Police and Schedules Planning and Analysis Branch.

The second speaker is Mr. Hugh McCallum, he will present a talk on Tuesday, November 2nd on "Institutionalized Violence: A Northern Perspective". Mr. McCallum is a noted Canadian journalist, best known for co-authoring the book on the Canadian north, "This Land is Not for Sale". He has written articles in numerous Canadian and American newspapers and periodicals such as Time Magazine, New York Times, Globe & Mail, United Church Observer, Saturday Night and has appeared regularly on radio, on TV, as a panelist and commentator on the northern and native subjects both locally and nationally across Canada.

He has also written many scripts for many TV programs. The last major story he covered for the media was the "Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry, 1975-76". At present he is staff co-ordinator of the INTER CHURCH PROJECT ON NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT, PROJECT NORTH.

On Wednesday, November 3rd, George Rude will speak on "Violence: A Historical Perspective". George Rude is Professor of History at Concordia University in Montreal. His major concern has been a historical study of violence. Among his noted publications are "A Crowd in the French Revolution", "The Crowd in History" and "Paris and London in the 18th Century Studies in Popular Protest".

Violence plays many roles in society. For some people it is a positive force to achieve personal freedom. For other people violence is a disruptive force to the social fabric.

Canada has not been without violence in the recent decade. The Government's War Measures Act, the occupation by Indians of the northern environment by major northern companies are just a few examples of violence which Canadians experience.

The Chancellor Dunning Trust Lectures for this fall will be a major platform for discussion of this major issue in Canadian life.

UBC goes dry for 30 days

VANCOUVER [CUP] — The student pub at the University of British Columbia will not be serving beer for the next month. The student council voted 20-10 Oct. 20 to prohibit liquor from Alma Mater Society functions and outlets in the student union building until November 22.

The decision — which AMS representatives say will curb vandalism and liquor abuse on campus — closed the pub (The Pit) and the liquor lounge (The Lethe) effective Oct. 20 and barred liquor from functions sponsored by clubs and undergraduate societies in the building.

The council made the decision because it feared the liquor administration branch of BC (LAB) would revoke the Pit's liquor permit unless students moved to curb alcohol abuse by Pit patrons.

Representatives met with RCMP Sgt. Al Hutchinson and "he informed us there was a problem, and he was writing to the LAB with the intention to close the Pit down," according to council chair Phil Johnson.

"We decided to take the matter into our own hands. We thought it was better if we took that initiative and exercise our control. We thought rather keep that control than have it forced on us," Johnson said.

The council also defeated a motion to ask the university administration to stop serving beer and wine until Nov. 22 in its pizza parlour. It will remain the only liquor outlet in the student union building.

Gay studies course on despite put-down

TORONTO [BODY POLITIC-CUP] — A new gay studies course offered at Toronto's Humber College is underway despite national adverse publicity generated by the Toronto Star.

When the course was first announced, the Toronto Star ran a large front-page story headlined "Homosexuality Taught As Way of Life in Humber Course - Will Make it Easier for Others."

The course's instructor Earl Reidy described the coverage as "a bit of a hatchet job" because it did not represent his plan for the course but suggested that this was a "how to" class in sex.

The story further implied, he added, "that because I am gay I could not teach objectively but rather would use the course to proselytize."

The story went out on the Canadian Press wire service and was picked up, during the week of August 11 to 15, by newspapers from St. John's to Vancouver.

In a column in the Star, Robert Nielsen wrote "a known homosexual can hardly expect to be hired as a marriage consultant, or as a private supervisor of young boys," and that Humber was ignoring a distinction "between tolerating homosexuality and ignoring its practice." He also objected to the fact that homosexuality "will be presented not as an aberration but as a way of life."

Neilson's column brought a barrage of protest from Star readers — one of whom suggested that Neilson was obviously in need of taking the Humber course himself.

"For every one antagonistic call that came in," said a Humber official, "five came in that were supportive."

President Wragg wasn't deterred by the initial flurry of bad publicity, however. "We've got to show the guts and determination to do it, it's a valid course."

Finn workers get Sunday sauna

HELSINKI [ENS-CUP] — In Finland, where sauna bathings on Sundays is a tradition, papermill workers have just negotiated a "sauna premium" which will force employers to compensate them for missing their weekly sauna baths when they have to work on Sundays.

Each time a paper mill worker has to miss his or her regular Sunday sauna session, the company will pay the employee a three-dollar and thirty-cent premium which is the cost of two admissions to a public sauna and swimming pool.

Susie Q week:

Woman's Center opposed

Susie Q, the traditional "Sadie Hawkins" Week at Queen's, will be spotlighted with another event this year—a "Woman's Week" sponsored by the university's Women's Centre. Claiming the concept of Susie Q to be "demoralizing, degrading and sexist," the Women's Centre is organizing their own schedule of events to oppose Susie Q and define women's rightful place in society. "Susie Homemaker's Week is only a way to publicize that women are being given a chance to come out from being dominated by the male's superior role," believes the Center.

Ariadne Symons, chairman of Susie Q Week showed respect for their attitude though she felt it to be one of a minority; "shared by less than 5 percent of the University." Ms. Symons approached Carla Hayes, head of Queen's Women's Centre (and last year's Susie Q Chairwoman) in hopes of reaching a compromise though she received no favorable response. "Susie Q Week is only meant to be a good time," Ms. Symons said, "and is not intended to evaluate or criticize the woman's position in male-female relationships."

6 campus comment

by Elizabeth Klinck

Campus Comment for this week asked students to comment on the up-coming American presidential election. Questions included: what do you think will be the outcome of the election; and what effect do you think the outcome will have on Canada?

Donny Johnson

"I wouldn't trust Ford to feed my cat" was Donny's answer when asked to comment on the presidential candidates. Donny (Economics '77) felt that Canadians would generally "identify with Ford since he's from a northern state."

"In spite of his grin, Carter is the more honest of the two...and more apologetic. He's not afraid to say that he has made a mistake." He felt that by contrast "Ford was assinine to defend General Brown to the utmost."

Donny felt that if Carter wins and makes some reforms, it will have some effect on the Canadian people. However, "If Ford wins, there will be no change. I'm afraid that Carter peaked too early. People may ask, 'Do I really want a peanut farmer for a president?' I don't know if they'll buy him in the end. But then, who wants to vote for a wishy-washy old man?" He concluded by saying, "The results will be really close on paper Ford cannot win, but in practise, it may be different."

Fredericko Balfourini

When asked who he thought would win the election, Freddy (Economics '78) replied "anyone could win... whoever has the best strategy for campaigning. The two candidates are not really opposed on issues." Freddy felt that Carter had already won, campaign-wise. However, Ford has saved one quarter of his campaign budget for the last six days before the election... this indicates that he thinks that the people can be swayed. The Harris polls have shown the indecisiveness of the people."

Stephen Southern

Stephen (Politics '79) felt that Ford's opinions on defense policy "coincide more closely with Trudeau's than do those of Carter." He felt that Canadians could better identify with Ford since he is more Conservative. Most people want this type of president in the White House. Look at Trudeau, lately he has been more conservative than before.

Stephen remarked that Trudeau and Ford had similar economic ideology as well. "Ford is making cutbacks and vetoing welfare bills...another example of his conservative nature." Concluding his remarks, Stephen said "the outcome won't have much effect one way or the other, but I think Ford is the better candidate."

Alex Brown

"As Canadians we identify more closely with Ford than with Carter." When asked to voice her opinion on the two candidates' campaigns and on the outcome of the election, Alex (Politics '77) stated that "Ford is well-intentioned, but as his campaign proceeds, he seems less and less competent. I don't think that his blunders are all that serious, and they may be blown out of proportion, but I do think that even someone running for a relatively less important position, say county judge, would have more political savvy Jimmy Carter will win, despite his sleazy smile. Their policies are so close, but the polls are showing Carter ahead Ford has lost his momentum."

Alex concluded by saying that "Jerry Brown would have been really good...he seemed to practise what he preached, and live what he stood for. But, he didn't have enough experience."

Sex and Divorce

by Howard Smith

Our attitudes about sex are the sickest of the many maladies with which our society is afflicted.

A classic example of this malaise can be gleaned from Canada's Divorce Act. Enshrined in our law is the principle that adultery is a good

Coeducational Residence

Dear Editor:

In response to your editorial of October 19, 1976, "Another Morris Hall," I would like to point out a few facts which you may find informative and enlightening.

1. Contrary to what you suggest, the Residences Board has considered more co-educational residences at Queen's, but has rejected them for the time being for two very good reasons. One - no money. As you know, residences must be self-supporting. There are no government grants to support either the building or operating of university residences, hence, all income is dependent on fees. We feel that it is difficult enough to keep our heads above water with the present fee structure, and to increase it in order to provide capital funds to construct a new residence (with the current high rate of interest on mortgage loans) would be both financially foolhardy and ethically irresponsible. Two - no demand. Your statement, "...the unfilled demand for a spot in Morris Hall this year could have filled another building of the same capacity..." is totally inaccurate. At this writing, Morris has one bed empty, and the only reason that there weren't half a dozen beds vacant is due to the willing cooperation of some female students in half-empty rooms to double up so as to allow 4 additional male students to be accommodated. In Royce Hall, also, there are one or two spaces left for those desiring co-educational residences.

I think these two factors speak for themselves. In addition, however, were money available and the demand overwhelming, you would find the Residences Board a strong supporter of co-ed residences. When Morris turned co-ed in 1972 it was with virtually the unanimous support of the Residence Board; so much so, in fact, that the Residence Board took direct responsibility for the operation of Morris in order to ensure its success. If you should look further, you would also find that - except for Morris - neither the I.R.C. nor the W.R.C. and their constituents were willing to part with a "single sex" residence to enlarge the co-ed system. With the addition of Royce Hall in 1971-72, however, the number of co-ed spaces on campus was increased to 745.

2. The demand for "single sex" residences is still high, both from men and women. The only significant vacancies occur in the Jeanne Mance (male) residence.

3. Your statement that "...parental circumspection has been an overriding consideration of the Residence Board..." is also inaccurate. The late John Deutsch, at whose instigation the Residences Board came into being, made very clear that neither the University nor the Residences were to act "in loco parentis" - principles vigorously adhered to ever since. In fact, except for certain academic sanctions, the behaviour and discipline of the students at Queen's is totally in the hands of the various student governments.

4. "The vigilant custodians who guard the doors around the clock present a challenge to entry." You'd better believe it! Ask anyone from any other university why Queen's residences are so pleasant. It's because every stick of furniture hasn't been carried off, and every wall covered with graffiti - thanks to those very custodians.

5. "...damages to that residence (Morris Hall) were the lowest on Leonard Field." Also inaccurate. Per person cost of damages for 1975-76 placed Morris second lowest on the field.

To go beyond these factual corrections I do not plan to do except for one remark. I am completely appalled by the spurious reasoning, invalid conclusions and morally ambiguous insinuations your editorial writer makes with regard to the attack on Victoria Hall by the students of Engineering '79. To suggest for one second that the women asked for it, or the Residence Board encouraged it by living in or supporting a single sex residence has as much validity as suggesting that the Queen's Journal Editor should be responsible for the losses of the Queen's football team.

That the Editor condones such behaviour is almost incomprehensible. I have always held the Queen's Journal in considerable regard for its concern over student affairs, but this suggestion is both insulting to the women residents and patronizing to the Engineering students. One's room, be it at home or at university is a private place. If the Engineering students are so eager to enter Victoria Hall, let them become friends with the girls who live there, so that they may enter as responsible adults, and welcome guests.

Pat Douglas-Murray

Ed. Note: A few misunderstandings exist. Please let us be clear on our position regarding the raid on Victoria Hall. In no way does the JOURNAL condone the actions of the engineers. We consider their actions immature and deplorable but we attempted to look beyond their actions for a reason why.

Secondly, it was not the JOURNAL's intention to suggest that another residence be constructed but ground for an "instant" divorce. This legal principle arises from our Dark Ages' attitude regarding the role of sex in marriage.

Let's say you enter a traditional marriage relationship. If you do so you will internalize the principle of monogamy. In so doing you elevate sexual fidelity to the status of a condition of your contract of marriage. The Divorce Act recognizes this contractual condition, and gives it teeth by countenancing the dissolution of marriage in adultery.

As human beings tend to generalize principles, the "contractual condition" of monogamy has become the defining essence of marriage. You "screw around," and it's over. The fallacy of this dogmatic thinking is exposed by recognizing that if a spouse "fools around" and is caught, the other party does not immediately cease to love that person. They might be enraged, disappointed, hurt or heartbroken at their spouse's infidelity, but if they stop loving that person, it is not instantaneous.

Love is a powerful emotion, not to be created at a moment's notice; not to be obliterated at the snap of a finger. Nothing could be farther from reality than our mythical concept of "falling in love." Infatuated you might be in a moment, but love you'll have to wait for. Similarly, you don't "fall out of love." There's nothing quick about the emotional bond of love. Consider the death of a member of your family. Could you forget it overnight? It's not they that linger on, that makes your heart ache in your breast - it's your love for them. And as it grew, so it dies - slowly.

When hubby comes home with blond hair on his collar, and wife uncovers the "betrayal," she no more stops loving him than would she had he violently died in an accident. The only thing that happens to her when she discovers the adultery is she has a motive to kill her love, and depending upon how well she has espoused the "condition" of monogamy, she may or may not do so. That's the other angle to love - you "will it" or you "kill it" deliberately. When someone "happens" in your life, you purposely want to love them - you "will it." The same goes for ending love - you intentionally "kill it." Adultery is construed as a license to kill love. That the law sanctions this conclusion only serves to fortify our foolish notions.

rather that "it is now time to continue the conversion process" which involves primarily the cost of converting washrooms.

Thirdly, we received highly reliable information that, in fact, enough males and females had signified an interest in coed Morris to fill another residence of the same capacity (180 beds). This figure includes applications from students presently in women's residence who listed Morris Hall as a second or third choice, but does not include first year women who presently live in another coed residence who may have a preference for the Queen's residence area.

Setting aside the case where adultery is a symptom of other problems in a marriage, an adultery may be simply a physical act. Part A combines with part B, certain motions are entertained (and entertained), skyrockets ascend and it's over. As a purely physical act, an adultery needn't be materially different from a handshake or a conversation over coffee. If such trivia is to challenge a genuine love relationship, surely some obtuse thinking has altered our perspective.

That "obscure thinking" is that sex and love are the same thing, or that either is a prerequisite for the other, or that sex is property.

You may love your mom and dad, but you don't have sex with them. You may have had sex though not necessarily to the extent of intercourse with people you don't love. Sex and love may be put together as somewhat of an ultimate, but each can stand alone. Since, even though husband and wife may love one another, a stray "roll in the hay" doesn't have to harm their love.

The reason Westerners insist upon the importance of the "contractual condition" of fidelity arises from another of our side attitudes. We treat our husbands and wives as sexual property, and just as we get upset when our car or golf clubs are used without permission, so we become incensed when our spouses are borrowed.

This is the real reason that our attitudes and The Divorce Act prohibit adultery in marriage. Human beings are not, as the abolition of slavery would suggest, anybody's property. The foundation of marriage is mutual love - let us rid ourselves of toolhardy notions that suggest "sexual property" is what it's all about. In doing this, we stand to eliminate the senseless misery of divorce over matters which might well be forgotten.

Blanks!

Dear Editor:

The occupants of Fort Garret would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the editors of the 1976-77 Who's Where, for their imaginative display of environmental consciousness. Think of all the ink that was saved by not publishing the addresses and phone numbers of the students occupying the same residence as last year. Right on, fellows!

Anyone not also owning last year's edition might well ask, "Who is where?"

G. Greig, D. Frid, B. Guthrie, A. Cameron

Dear Editor:

Somebody had better do some fast talking concerning the absence of a significant number of phone numbers and addresses from the Who's Where. At the same time he/she they should be preparing a supplement of the omissions for distribution or printing in the Journal.

I would rather hand in an essay late than incomplete.

Good news: God is not Gone!

Dear Editor:
Howard Smith has raised some very serious issues in his recent article, God isn't dead - he never lived. He has managed to paint a very bleak picture of the 'Church', and in less than two columns he has tolled the bells for the death of that Church. However, Mr. Smith is guilty of several errors, both in terminology and in philosophy-theology.

Why did Mr. Smith select the title God isn't dead - he never lived? Nothing in his article supports such a claim. At best, he tries to prove that the CHURCH should not exist, but then the Church is not God. God does not exist because the Church exists, and the Church's death would not signal the end of God. God is an entity, a supernatural being whose existence cannot, and therefore ought not to be, proven scientifically. Those who do not believe in God cannot, naturally, accept that He does exist. The Church is an institution, complete with the negative attitudes which surround the word 'institution' in today's society. It is an institution which seeks to teach its members the 'Good News' of God's activity on their behalf, and it seeks to provide its members with a framework in which they can exercise their faith and participate in the social activities which are required by almost every faith. (I use the term 'Church' in a very loose sense here to denote any religious organization; I do not restrict it to those of the Western Tradition.)

Mr. Smith is guilty of another fallacy. He confuses the Church with Religion. These two terms are not synonymous. Friedrich Schleiermacher provides us with a good definition of Religion: "It is a way of thinking, a faith, a peculiar way of contemplating the world and of combining what meets us in the world. It is a way of acting, a peculiar desire and love, a special kind of conduct and character. It is a kind of activity having to do with life." The Church takes this religion and institutionalizes it. The Church gives it form so that the members can better express it and can participate in the religious experience or 'phenomenon'. Even if we were to reject the Church, it would still not constitute grounds for rejecting Religion, which would exist in spite of the lack of a Church, because man is made in a way that necessitates that he think of religion.

At the end of his article, Mr. Smith makes the following statement: "The modern-day church is an anachronism devoid of social utility - a fool's gallery in the power struggle long since transferred to another forum. The sooner men's minds are seized of this recognition, the sooner will we be freed of this albatross of historically unprecedented proportions." The Church is NOT devoid of social utility. There may indeed be other institutions that look after the social needs of the people but this should in no way preclude the Church from taking an active part in this field. It is the tradition of the Church to involve itself in the social needs of the people. Before we scoff at this, let us remember that there is nothing wrong with tradition as long as it is not meaningless. In the case of the Church, it is not meaningless to continue a practice which, for the Christian, extends back to the time of Christ, and, for other faiths, even further back into antiquity. There is nothing archaic in the tradition that every man should help his neighbour and the Church is right in continuing its role in this sector of public life.

But the Church does more than just look after the social well-being of the destitute. By far its biggest task is the instruction of its members in the ways of man, of the world, and of God, as seen through the eyes of the individual Church. Mr. Smith would have us think that this is an example of the Church's use of "power". He failed to understand that the word 'power' has two different meanings. In most states, the Church cannot wield the same kind of power that the government exercises. A government's power rests on a legislative or military basis but the power of the Church is based on a religious-moral-social concept of life. If the power of the Church is strong, it is only because its people still feel a need for direction in their religious lives. The power of the Church lies in its use of moral persuasion but the power of the government rests on legal statutes.

Mr. Smith is making an all-too-common error when he judges the Church. He sees that there are parts of it which do not function properly and he therefore asserts that the whole must be rejected. I would agree with him that there are places where any Church can be found to be remiss, because every Church is run by humans, and man is not a perfect creature. But the Church still serves a useful function in Society, and it is still a necessary organization for man. I would suggest to Mr. Smith that he view the imperfections of the Church as ulcers which can be removed without having to remove the whole Church.

Mr. Smith writes that: "The utility of religion in the face of an organized society is becoming questionable." What exactly is the utility of Religion? Is it really the act of duping man into living a life that is controlled by a power-wielding church? This is a naive view of the role of religion in the life of man. Mr. Smith would have us believe that man does not need religion. Is he prepared to assert that man has suddenly changed so drastically that he is no longer questioning his past, his present, or his future? Is he prepared to assert that man is no longer questioning the relationship of everything around him? Has man then become so decadent in his intellectual development that he can survive merely by living from day to day in an organized society, without having to think? Man, by his very nature, thinks, and he thinks about the world around him. Therefore man questions his existence and the existence of those things which surround him. From the beginning of recorded time, we have examples of man's efforts to explain the events, natural and supernatural, which have taken place. Because man could not explain life, he tried to rationalize it by an appeal to a supernatural Creator. Because he could not understand death, but still instinctively hoped that death would not be the end, he tried to develop theories of the 'Hereafter'. This is the process of creating a Religion and this is the reason that Religions exist. Are we now to assume that we know all the answers? Surely Mr. Smith does not believe that man has become so conceited in his opinion of his intellectual abilities that he can explain everything that has happened in the World up to this moment in rational, non-supernatural terms. I would like to meet the man who could do this!

To have a religion does not necessarily mean that one must believe in the God of the Judeo-Christian tradition as he is interpreted by that Faith. Every religion has a central being, be it physical or metaphysical, but this central being is the God of the Universe, be He worshipped as God, Yahweh, Allah, Nirvana, etc. Naturally, I base this on my personal belief that: 1. God does exist, and 2. There is only one God, but he is seen through different Religions as being different. Since this is a Belief, it cannot be refuted, nor will I attempt to persuade anyone that it is the correct Belief. I will point out, however, that the God of the Christian Faith is NOT understood in the way that Mr. Smith has described him, and I would suggest that he take a course in Christian Theology before he makes any further statements on the Christian concept of God. One just cannot simplify Christianity by saying that God is a 'Big Brother' who watches over us and makes us "pay when our number is up," even if this is the common view expressed by Billy Graham and his Associates. This idea does not take into account the Christian experience of Salvation through Jesus Christ. Even if one's deeds on earth were such that one's soul ought to be banished to everlasting damnation, the chances are that it will be saved by God through his Divine Grace.

Man still needs Religion. Man still needs the institutional structure to transmit to the faithful the message of that religion and to instruct them in the way in which they ought to live their life. God lives, and He will never die.

The modern-day Church

Salty anachronisms?

Dear Editor,

It seems to me that a couple of important issues are being dodged by contributors to both sides of the recent "God - Church" debate in the Journal.

In a letter to the Editor, Frans van der Ven asserts that God is an invention of the Church Fathers, a ruse that moderns would do well to be aware of. It is unfortunate that a statement of such questionable historical accuracy could be seriously entertained in a university environment. Historical documents—Christian, Jewish, and pagan—concerning Jesus Christ, who claimed to be God, are open to our scrutiny; and several of these documents date from the first century A.D. (One useful discussion of the pertinent documents may be found in J.N.D. Anderson's Christianity: The Witness of History (London: Tyndale Press, 1969). These various sources provide the historical grounds for deciding whether or not Christ was God incarnate in history; and on this issue of Christ's historicity, Christianity itself stands or falls.

Although I am myself a Christian, I found Gord Taylor's and Dave Williams' replies to Howard Smith's article, "God isn't dead—he never lived," somewhat distressing. What Taylor and Williams do not consider is the measure of truth in Smith's statement that the "modern-day church is an anachronism devoid of social utility." Surely Christians have to open their eyes to the cultural isolation of much of the church, its manifest hypocrisy and spiritual aridity, its culpable irrelevance in face of desperate human suffering. I do not mean to paint the church all black. It isn't. But let Christians not side away from Smith's seeing part of the church more clearly than we often see ourselves. After all, even Smith's appraisal of the church's ineffectiveness is less pointed than that of Christ Himself: "You are the salt of the earth... but if even salt has become tasteless, with what will it be seasoned? It is useless either for the soil or for the manure pile; men throw it out."

European trains...

Americans, soldiers and Turks

by Paul Dalle-Molle

First-time travelers to Europe are often given the advice that seeing Europe by train is not only the fastest and most efficient (and inexpensive) method but also that it provides a constant opportunity to watch and meet people from all nations and from every background. Trains are simply more social than other modes of transport.

This past spring yours truly discovered, almost daily, the value of such advice. On the trains I met a remarkable variety of people and it was while travelling by train that I had the most memorable experiences of my trip. This journey was a rousing success and a great deal of the joy is due to just being on the trains, where opportunity and fortune seem to lurk in the form of fellow passengers. Of course, there are unfortunate moments too.

For example, on our very first train ride (from Luxembourg into France) my friends and I encountered, to our utter horror, the archetypal "American Tourists": an educated and rich mother and daughter from California. They had too much of the wrong kind of luggage. Their ideas about Europeans and their food, climate and habits were usually wrong and always condescending. Their softness and sensitivity seemed almost rehearsed, while their loudness and impropriety annoyed and aroused even the most complacent of our car-mates.

While in northern Spain, heading for the Basque country of the Pyrenees, my companions and I were forced - by the circumstances of the tediously slow and crowded Spanish trains - to wait in the sweltering Iberian sun in a two-car train packed with militiamen, Guardia Civil and army regulars, all armed with automatic weapons. We were lonely North American souls, with minimal Spanish, helpless to understand the constant and searching gazes of dozens of poor, tough soldiers who were probably lonelier than we three. The long ride which followed did little to ease our tension. Although the Spanish people were generally the friendliest Europeans we encountered, this particular train ride was the most frightening of our trip.

Except for visiting the former concentration camp at Dachau, the most moving experience of my trip was on our fourth day, when we met a young Turkish man. He offered seats in his compartment to us, and was anxious to speak with us. He had been in France for three years, working in a steel mill, saving his wages so that he could send for his wife and two children. He was determined that his family should be lucky enough to grow up in France - it seems that this had been the dream of his mother who, although a peasant and not wealthy, had taught her son the rudiments of French, mathematics and reading. He was intelligent and hard-working, and very generous. He and I struggled together for hours, each speaking poor French, as we took turns talking about our homelands. I shall never forget his strength, his smile and his dedication to his family.

more, the airports have to go someplace, don't they?

No need to worry then about larger centres that were never really railway towns. These cities can relocate their railway lines - there will always be railways for them. I worry more about the passing of the times and towns in which the railway was always there - its regular whistles and horns signaling the start of school or the end of the workday.

It's hard to see today how a railway engineer could be more than just another unionist, almost inconceivable that a little guy could be proud that his dad is "the big E."

I didn't have to be a former brakeman to feel some of what the old-timer meant when he said "We don't gain much except that we lose something, too."

These are the academics, the political heavies, and a third troupe remaining as yet unnamed.

The academics are readily observed and easily overheard as they occasionally gather together to mutter turgid sentences at each other. An extract from a typical conversation:

"But Robert, don't you feel that the basic positivistic tenets of your thesis negate your stoic anti-impersonalism, resulting ultimately in mere tautology?"

This rather boring pattern is occasionally broken by a quote in a foreign language; it doesn't really matter which, for even if none of the participants understand a word of it, they will all mumble appreciatively.

The political heavies are divided into two categories, the revolutionary and the standard. The revolutionaries can be distinguished by their frequent use of such words as 'proletariat', 'imperialist', 'marxist', and 'capitalist swine'.

The standard political heavies have developed their own patterns of speech which are, in the most part, largely abbreviated. For example, P.C.'s, A.M.S., A.S.U.S., O.F.S.*

N.U.S.* N.S.D.* and so on. They are looked on by the other coffee shop people with something, (not quite awe or respect,) but something. The logic behind this is that anyone who gets his name or picture in the paper more than once in the academic year, must be important.

The third group, unnamed about five paragraphs ago, shall be referred to as the 'Joe Cools'. This is by far the largest and most widely encompassing category, and includes the socialites, the travellers, the arts people and the stars. They are the ones who look upon all others with complete and utter disdain, having practiced this disdainful look in front of the mirror innumerable times; it now comes naturally. The traveller variety is especially noticeable after Christmas reading week, invariably wearing a white T-shirt and smiling a lot, just to show off their Florida-Bahamas-Jamaica tan to its fullest advantage.

So there we have them in clear stereotyped groupings. I think it was the Padre who said, "you see the same people in the coffee shop, day after day, week after week, month after month, but never year after year." Ain't it the truth?

...and the decline and fall of Canadian rail

by Jim Klein

Nothing so much reminds me of a bright lazy summer day as a bright autumn day in which I've accomplished almost nothing. Today I recalled one August-day off when I awoke before noon only to meet a train that didn't arrive until past one anyway.

Near the end of my hour-long wait at the station, I talked a bit with an old trainman. He looked around the building, then said out loud what I was thinking myself - "Oh this isn't at all what it used to be..."

That short visit to the station was a sad reminder of the decline of Canadian trains. Not only Lightfoot's lyrical trains, but the very real trains that once served an entire town as more than half of the town served the trains.

The passenger trains seem to be most deteriorated. Today they idle in sidings while freights rumble past. Fifteen years ago if a relative was travelling to town, there was no need to specify 'by train' - that was presumed. Then anybody and often everybody spent at least part of each long weekend at a station where painting and renovation were regular events. Last August I couldn't have guessed how long the station walls had gone unwashed. Today the holiday hosts divide themselves between the airport and the bus terminal - some would say by economic class. It seems only the patient class meets trains.

It could well be that the age of rail travel was but a phase in a changing world. Some, like Ontario Northland, hope the change follows a cycle, that the trains will have another day.

But perhaps the cycle has changed. Canada's two major lines often seem to compete in furnishing most missed connections, earliest closings of club cars (in my experience CP wins at 20 miles west of North Bay on a Friday night) and general rudeness. Should they scare away enough passengers they can point to their deficits as grounds for reduced services, less frequent or less complete trains. And so on.

To be more reasonable, I should note that times change, that viability governs all industries. The gray days of trains gave birth to secondary industry all across Canada. What's

Ye old coffee shoppe

by Trish Crowe

The coffee shop has always been a tradition encrusted institution at Queen's. What now is referred to nostalgically as 'the old coffee shop' had managed over the years to develop a friendly, open atmosphere, against all odds. Physically, the coffee shop was really dull; the walls were kind of blah, the chairs were OK but the tables were tables. What more can one say?

And yet, despite these drawbacks, it was the most popular gathering place on campus, second only to the Pub. The unattractive appearance of the old coffee shop was fully intentional; the coffee shop was designed to provide the weary student with just enough caffeine to give them the strength to continue the journey from class to class.

Students were to be discouraged from malingering there, such activity being regarded as a thoroughly non-academic one. In the wonderful quest for knowledge that we all are supposedly engaged in, the powers that be regarded the coffee shop merely as a barren rest area at the side of the road.

But now that the old coffee shop has been replaced by the sidewalk cafe, things have changed. It's almost enjoyable to sit by the window, drinking coffee that almost certainly has been brewed from some chemical residue purchased at the rear door of the science building, watching the goings-on in the outside world. I say 'almost enjoyable' because as yet, the coffee shop is too new and too sterile to be comfortable; the tables need to be scratched a bit more and the chairs need a few more cups of coffee spilled on them in order that a truly lived-in look might be achieved.

The people who frequent the coffee shop usually do so on a regular basis and there are some who seem to be there all the time. The most regular clientele can be categorized into three main groups.

Less than dynamic

Avis on AMSOC

Dear Editor:

I find your editorial "A.M.S. Lacks Direction" somewhat contradictory, although it contains some accurate observations. If, as you suggest, the executive is strong and gives leadership to Outer Council, I fail to see how the Council can lack direction. One of the main purposes of any executive is to provide leadership and direction, and I submit that our executive has been doing just that.

I do agree, though, that recent Outer Council meetings have been "less than dynamic". With the exception of the debate over the CLC Day of Protest which was neither dull nor uninformed in my view, there have been few highly contentious matters. I would like to believe that this is at least partially the result of competent and efficient administration by the executive and commissioners, since many heated debates in the past have centred around administrative bangles.

Inevitably, much of what goes on in a Council meeting is an information interchange. This exchange is neither unprepared nor rhetorical as you suggest it is. It is an important part of Inner Council's function to communicate its activities to Outer Council for their comments and questions. I can understand however that most of this sort of information may be of limited interest to the Journal.

The revised budget proposals brought forward at last week's meeting were thoughtfully prepared by the Commissioners in consultation with the Vice-President (Operations) and then debated in a regular meeting of Inner Council. I believe that they were sound proposals in view of the needs of the student community and the financial position of the Society. I am not in the least surprised that they met with Outer Council's approval, and I would have been very displeased if cuts had been made for the sake of making cuts - an attitude which the Journal appears to endorse.

You suggest that more responsibility be delegated to Outer Council and that Outer Council members should participate more actively. With the greatest respect for members of Outer Council, I suggest that any lack of participation on their part is not due to a want of enthusiasm on the part of this executive. It is hard to see how Outer Council responsibility could be increased. Important policy and budget decisions are always presented to Council, often accompanied by reports and studies to assist council in forming intelligent opinions.

Any matter of concern to a member of Council may be brought before Council by the member personally. There is no need to wait for the executive to raise the issue. Finally, there is always room for the participation of Outer Council members in the activities of the A.M.S. National Student Day, OFS Policy Review, Instructional Development are all areas in which Council members can make their views heard. I still need representatives for the Canadian Bureau of International Education and the Association of Student Councils. Outer Council has been informed of these positions. Few members have shown interest.

The conclusion at which I am reluctantly forced to arrive is that any lack of enthusiasm or participation on the part of Outer Council which the Journal may have observed can be attributed only to a lack of enthusiasm on the part of some (definitely not all) Council members. I do not believe that there is a lack of direction from the executive; nor is there any reluctance to delegate responsibility to Outer Council. I welcome suggestions as to what more we could do.

On behalf of the A.M.S. Executive,
James C. Avis

Women they're private property or their private property

Dear Editor:

I would like to offer a few comments on statements and conclusions which were made in the editorial "Another Morris Hall."

The engineers who broke an expensive door at Victoria Hall may not have been being "simply malicious," but if they were not, they demonstrated a blatant disregard for other people's property. Raids which destroy or do damage, whether men or women are responsible, should not be tolerated or excused by anyone. To say that the presence of staff at the desk provides an incentive or "challenge" to enter is an invalid excuse. These people are present to enforce the wishes of the majority of the women in the residences. (Two years ago the escort policy was approved by the majority of the residence women.) The staff depend upon the student body's respect for the women's wishes to enforce the rules; they are not equipped to prevent a determined group of people from breaking the regulations.

Why should a "sense of accomplishment" accompany a malefactor act? Authority and regulations are integral parts of our society. They are for the mutual benefit of all and cannot be disregarded because they curtail some of our own personal freedoms. Respect and acceptance of authority should have been learned before this point in our lives, but if they have not, they must be developed before we re-enter the mainstream of society.

It is noteworthy that the presence of women's residences has not provoked the majority of men on campus to rain "in a spontaneous display of masculinity." It is unfortunate that the actions of a very vocal minority have reflected on the rest of the men on campus, and in particular, on the members of the Engineering Faculty.

I also disagree with your conclusion that the creation of co-educational residences is the solution to raiding. At the moment Morris Hall has a waiting list for men; however, there is no active waiting list for women. Two empty women's doubles are being given to men and one women's half-double is still vacant. Women had an opportunity to fill these spaces but they did not, although there is an active and non-active waiting list of 124 women wanting residence admission. The residence applications indicate that the majority of women want to be in women's residences. Since it seems that women wish to have all-female residences, changing to co-ed residences does not seem like an appropriate solution to the problem of raiding. The solution would seem to be more respect for the few rules which are in force, and the imposition of fines for incidents such as the one on Tuesday.
Sincerely yours,
Anne Rempel

Faculty Unionization

Dear Editor:

I would like to take issue with some of the points raised in the article "Unions Aren't Needed Here" (October 19), and in particular, with the implication therein that the faculty at Queen's is well informed and entirely in harmony on the question of unionization.

The first meeting at which unionization was discussed was very poorly attended, and hence, the predominant view expressed at it can hardly be considered representative of the faculty's thinking as a whole (though presumably the non-attendance was indicative of a widespread epidemic of apathy). Some of the most naive and inane arguments against unionization were aired: that if the faculty opted for unionization, Queen's professors would find themselves punching time clocks, forced to work overtime against their will, told what they could and couldn't teach, etc. Many of these opinions were expressed with such vehemence that one could only surmise that irrational attitudes toward unions were unshakably entrenched in the minds of their proponents. The upshot of this discussion was that the Queen's University Faculty Association put itself on record as not even wanting to consider the possibility of unionization. That is, the faculty voted against even becoming informed about the unionization movement in Canada and the U.S. This decision, it can only be said, reflects provincialism at its worst - especially when one considers that by the end of this year an estimated 50 percent of all faculty members in Ontario will be unionized.

At a poorly attended meeting earlier this year, a Faculty

Association committee presented alternatives to the traditional form of negotiations with the administration (the membership), and on this occasion, the same ill-considered views in fact the committee in question gave unionization short shrift in presenting its report.

A great deal of stress was placed in the Faculty Association's meetings (and in Professor Bly's remarks in the Journal) on the unique atmosphere of cooperation at Queen's, which allegedly makes unionization unnecessary and undesirable. True, Queen's has a good tradition of cooperation between faculty and administration which we should all strive to preserve. However, we can go on praising ourselves to kingdom come, but the reality of the contemporary working world is that those who make the most noise get their demands (and needs) met, and that the vast majority of individuals only have a voice in the way the resources of society are divided up if they have membership in a union that has some clout and the power to negotiate contracts on their behalf. Without a union, the individual's leverage against the Government that holds the purse strings is virtually nil. I think circumstances have shown that Queen's faculty members are no exception to these principles.

Meanwhile, at last report, no one at Carleton University (recently unionized) was yet punching a clock, though a generous package of fringe benefits, guaranteed in an excellent new contract, were being enjoyed by all.

Sincerely yours,
Michael Fox

Peripheral Visions

What sort of a man reads Playboy?

Last Friday a letter signed by an "alienated freshette" appeared in the Journal. In it she complained that her male companions were attempting to become more than "just friends" whenever she invited them over for coffee. Apparently her invitation was open to misinterpretation. I was not aware of her dilemma until my friend Jack approached me with a copy of the newspaper. He showed me the letter and said, "I think I know that girl."

Jack is an average young adult with an average appetite. But he is not in engineering and is therefore unable to externalize his fantasies onto more concrete unrealities such as the Golden Words. And, living in Kingston, he cannot go down to the Yonge Street Strip or Sherbrook St. to see girls ravished by garter snakes, racoons and sundry varmints. At least not regularly.

It was Friday night. Jack washed his supper dishes and then lay down for a while. But alas, he knew no rest. Jack has learned to associate Friday night with action. He had been taught, through books and television that people go out and have fun on Friday night. This was the nebulous foundation of his uneasiness. He had no plans for that evening.

Nervously, he reached under his bed for the September issue of True Detective. He skimmed over the articles entitled, "I Was Held Prisoner in the School of Nursing," and "Infiltrated a Co-ed Dormitory for the CIA." Jack found this material irritating because the only thing he had any prospect of infiltrating that evening was the biology library. (No, Joe College, they do not raise sheep in Earl Hall.)

Still restless, Jack decided to go to the corner store to buy some cookies. He shaved, brushed his teeth, took ten dollars out of the teapot and proceeded to the store. Once in the store, he was determined to go straight to the cookie section. He would not even glance at the magazine rack. He would not even walk by it on the way to the cash register. These were his silent vows.

Shunning carnality proved easier than expected. When Jack arrived, the magazine rack was completely surrounded by young men in gold Applied Science jackets. Even the seediest epistles on the bottom shelf were barred from view by several engineers crunched on all fours. Theirs was the most flagrant indifference to the "This is not a library" notice posted by the shopkeeper.

But Jack couldn't help but notice the new edition of Penthouse high on the top shelf. Specifically, he was attracted to the headline superimposed on the covergirl's forehead: "The Truth About Campus Sex Facts and Photographs." This is the sort of thing that intrigues Jack. Besides, Penthouse is a high-class magazine (meaning it costs more than a dollar and its photographers smear their lenses with vaseline to produce the "dreamlike" effect). Furthermore, it has a reputation for photographing girls of character and intelligence. (Miss October tells us she will not pursue her career as a social worker on the west coast because "the sex is better here in St. Louis.") Also, it is crammed with social content (Jimmy Carter expands on his death wish.) Jack wanted that magazine. Calmly, he lurked around the cookie section until the last customer left. (Actually, they didn't all leave. Three of the engineers, now exhausted, had fallen asleep at the foot of the magazine rack.) Jack wasted no time proceeding to the cash register with his cookies and the Penthouse underneath a copy of The Atlantic Monthly.

It seemed like an eternity as Jack waited for the store owner to start adding up his bill. Suddenly, the door opened and a girl walked in. Jack's heart raced as he recognized her from one of his classes. In his panic, he wanted to grab the magazines and run, leaving the $10 bill on the counter. He froze instead.

The girl came to the cash register with a box of tea bags. Jack stared at the counter but she recognized him anyway.

"You're Jack aren't you?"
"Yes."
"Getting Much homework done?"
"Yes."
"Like to come over for tea?"
"Yes."
"You don't have to shout you know."

Jack turned to the store owner to see what the delay was. The merchant had been leaning through Jack's Penthouse and was about to hold up the center-fold. Jack's knees buckled in horror. Still he had the presence of mind to turn to the girl and sputter, "I-I-Jimmy C-C-Carter," as he sank to the floor.

Back at the girl's apartment Jack began to get ideas. They had chatted in her living room for several minutes. Jack continued to blurt and stutter, coming close to tears on some of the harder questions. But now she was in the kitchen making tea and Jack was left alone with his imagination. She was doing most of the talking, had wasted little time in asking him over, and only had six roommates home that night as three were out buying tea. There was little to prevent Jack from concluding she was a walking dose. In his ecstasy he plunged through the kitchen door, upsetting a tray of tea and cookies which was travelling in the opposite direction. The results were a broken tea pot and another "alienated freshette."

I hope Jack's story has not been told in vain. You see, he really wasn't himself in that apartment. Tendencies arose in him which were cultivated by Hugh Hefner and his associates - masters of Pavlovian conditioning. Their magazines preach a reductionist philosophy, meaning they reduce the western male to his elemental appetites while dressing him in suede and leather, and feeding him book reviews and articles on air pollution so he can have mental orgasms as well. The result is neurosis among many young people, troubled by the vast difference between the way things are "supposed to be" according to the media and reality. And so as the plague and TB wards of bygone eras empty, the mental wards of the modern era fill up. Every age has its characteristic illness.

Perhaps "alienation" is simply this type of confusion compounded when it is transplanted onto a college campus full of happy, smiling faces. Sometimes it can be treated in the spirit of comedy as I have tried to do, but that isn't often the case.

Political scandals - tools of the historian

by Hugh Dodd

"Scandals are important—and fun!" according to Dr. Donald Swainson, commenting on the 1873 Pacific Scandal, which featured Sir John A. Macdonald, first Prime Minister of Canada, and a supporting cast. Dr. Swainson, of the Queen's History Department, is making a contribution to a Carleton Library series on Canadian political scandals.

"The interest in studying a scandal may be derived from seeing a party leadership in action during a crisis", states Dr. Swainson. "For the historian, a scandal may be used as an analytical tool to understand the inside workings of a political party."

The Pacific Scandal of 1873 had its beginnings several years earlier. The Conservative Government, under Macdonald's leadership, had made the decision to construct a transcontinental railway to the Pacific Ocean. However, at the same time, it was in serious political trouble. During the first years of Confederation, Nova Scotia had threatened to withdraw from Canada. Race and language problems between French and English were dramatized by the Riel Rebellion. The Government was anticipating an 1872 general election, and it was clearly in political difficulty.

Meanwhile, there were groups in competition for the prestigious railway contract. The most powerful internal group was headed by Sir Hugh Allan of Montreal, who had American partners.

In order to procure the contract, Sir Hugh did two things. He spent a great deal of money to increase his influence in the Quebec division of the Conservative party. Furthermore, he gave large sums of money to the Conservative party in the form of election contributions during the 1872 election.

As a result, the essence of the Pacific Scandal emerged. Did the government, which was in election trouble at the time, sell the charter to build Canada's first transcontinental railway?

Lucius Seth Huntington, Liberal MP for Schellford, spilled the beans on Macdonald. He acquired some condemning documents through an intermediary from George McMullen, an American colleague of Sir Hugh Allan. Huntington presented his case to the House of Commons, greatly alarming Macdonald and the Conservatives.

Macdonald and his colleagues made a clear attempt to cover up the scandal, by appointing a partisan Royal Commission. Macdonald's strategy was that the Royal Commission would move slowly, and the delays would make the public weary of the subject. However, the reverse was true. Royal Commissions were an innovation at that time, thus making them controversial. That fact did not help the situation for Macdonald. Furthermore, the public heard exaggerated stories as time progressed, making Macdonald's predicament worse. Still, Macdonald delayed. Support in the House of Commons slowly melted away.

To further complicate the matter, Macdonald reverted to his famous crutch, drinking. According to Dr. Swainson, Sir John had been drinking very heavily from the election of June 1872, until November 1873.

Finally, on November 5, 1873, Macdonald rose to the occasion, and made one of the best speeches of his life to the House of Commons. The speech had to be good, for he was fighting for his political life. However, despite this last ditch stand, the Macdonald Government fell. The Liberal Government under Alexander Mackenzie acquired the reins of power.

Dr. Swainson provided the Journal with a transcription of a letter written by Alexander Campbell, a law student, law partner and cabinet minister of Macdonald's. The insights of Campbell in this letter which was written just after put a proper perspective on the issue of the Pacific Scandal. The letter says, in part:

"I do not believe up to the last moment that he felt sure, or now feels sure, that all he telegraphed during the Elections (concerning election funding) has come out. From the time he left Kingston, after his own election, to go (to Western Ontario), I am very much afraid he kept himself more or less under the influence of wine, and that he really has no clear recollection of what he did on many occasions at Toronto and elsewhere after that period. I write all this in the greatest confidence simply to give you an idea of topic now it is only for the purpose of giving you the clue to much of the delay and paralysis of action which attended and helped to accomplish our downfall."

the inner history of the fall of the Ministry. No one has a higher opinion of Macdonald's abilities, or a more just sense of his many good qualities...and if I refer to this last

On campus recruiting...

Interviewer may ask - what's your family like?

by Deb Sigler

"On Campus Recruiting" is one of the employment services offered by Career Planning and Placement. Companies are contacted and arrangements made for representative teams to come onto campus to give information and interview students.

Applications are accepted from those disciplines the company requires. In some cases applications are sent for pre-screening. The company then writes the prospective student, who in turn goes to Planning and Placement to set up an interview. For those companies that do not pre-screen, students must sign up for interviews on a first come, first serve basis 10 days before the team will be on campus. The doors open at 8 pm, and lineups sometimes begin as early as 6:30 am according to Joan Alblas, head of the recruiting program. Most interviews take place from November to January.

To date, according to Alblas, 130 recruiting teams are planning to come onto campus. Some companies have 3 or 4 from different divisions. Last year, 167 teams came to interview prospective employees. The majority of these teams are interested in either Applied Science or Business students. Only about one-third of the companies are willing to talk to Arts students. Those companies that do interview Arts and Commerce students have a 6 month to 2 year training program for the positions available.

Career Planning and Placement offers a series of tapes and lectures on such subjects as how to write a resume, or prepare for an interview. Each faculty has a career coordinator who receives notices about prospective employment in that discipline.

The School of Business offers its own series of services to help with job seeking under its co-ordinator Rick Jackson. Included in these services are 3 seminars that cover all aspects of job hunting from ethics to interviews. For those wanting one, Jackson says a simulated video-taped interview can be run. An expert in the particular field the student is interested in will interview the student, and on viewing the taped interview, advise the student on ways to improve his techniques.

Both the graduating B. Comm and MBA classes produce a book which includes a short resume and picture of each student. These are distributed to 400-500 companies. The companies then get in touch with a particular student that meets their requirements.

In a brief put out by Proctor and Gamble, they cite the most important interview techniques as "A facility at effective verbal and written communications. Recruiters recognize this during an interview. Think before you speak." The brief goes on to say that a student with a particular area of interest has more to offer than one who is indecisive about what job is best for him. Proctor and Gamble feels that this fault is found most in Arts students. In order to make a favorable impression with the interviewer, Proctor and Gamble feels that "a neat business-like appearance is important; they realize it may be inconvenient for you to wear a suit on the day of your interview. Therefore, your tolerance of this minor inconvenience is usually appreciated, and noted." As well, Proctor and Gamble say that extracurricular activities are almost as important as academic standing. These extracurricular activities demonstrate one's leadership ability and "high marks alone are not the most accurate gauge of this."

Commerce Students in their lectures on finding employment, some of the mistakes most often made during interviews are: 1 appearance 2 overaggressiveness 3 passivity or lack of interest 4 overemphasis on money 5 unwillingness to start at bottom 6 condemnation of past employers 7 limp, fishy handshake 8 give idea have been shopping around for a job 9 lack of knowledge about the company - a good thing to do is to ask searching questions about the training program 10 lack of knowledge in field of specialization.

Some helpful hints given to Commerce students on interviews: 1 appearance 2 be ahead of time, NOT LATE 3 don't flatter unduly 4 don't chew gum or smoke 5 don't answer with clichés, or "yes" or "no" 6 sit up, look interested and alert 7 look the interviewer in the eye 8 REMEMBER NAMES 9 don't "fiddle" be relaxed 10 don't slight former employees or professors 11 don't bluff or lie 12 don't become overly familiar 13 thank the interviewer, and take cues to terminate 14 prepare in advance of research on the company to ask intelligent questions, 15 think of possible questions interviewer might ask and articulate answers to yourself.

Proctor and Gamble has compiled a list of interview questions by 92 employers. Of some most frequently asked, the less obvious ones are: What percentage of your college expenses did you earn and how? How did you spend your vacations while in school? How do you feel about your family? How did previous employer treat you? What is the source of your spending money? What do you do to keep in good physical condition? How do you usually spend a day? Is it an effort for you to be tolerant of persons with a background and interests different from your own? What type of people seem to rub you the wrong way? To what extent do you use liquor? Do you have a girl? Is it serious? Tell me about your home life during the time you were growing up. Tell me a story. Do you prefer working with others or by yourself? What kind of boss do you prefer?

Career Planning and Placement statistics indicate that last year, of 49 teams interviewing arts students, 43 offers were made and 19 accepted. Of economics, 28 teams, 11 offers were made and 6 accepted. Of 48 teams interviewing engineers, 47 offers were made and 22 accepted. The discrepancy between offers and acceptance is due to the fact that some students receive 3 or 4 offers.

After On Campus Recruiting is over, Career Planning and Placement offers another program called On Campus Permanent Employment Program, for graduating students who haven't accepted employment as of Jan. 1. A job description is sent to Career Planning and Placement where they are matched with cards students have filled out, stating their discipline, preferred location and profession. The students are notified about the job, but says Alblas they must do their own follow-up.

Career Planning and Placement also offers a student summer employment program, open to both grads and undergrads. This doesn't require the student to register, but simply to go to Placement and check the notices. Alblas says some 600 companies have been notified to date. The impetus, she says is on the student to "do things for themselves."

There are jobs available on campus. It is simply a matter of going out and looking, as well as being prepared for that all important interview, if you are lucky enough to be chosen for one.

A thoughtful look at the news

The immediate and most essential role of media is to provide society with necessary information.

No society can function in an intelligent and responsible manner without being well-informed about the issues it must resolve. No citizen can be expected to make responsible social, political, or economic judgments without being well-informed about these issues.

It is through reading and listening to the media that the individual is given some sense of his position and responsibilities in society. In countries where democratic institutions allow each citizen to take part and critically evaluate the policies and leaders of these political institutions, the role of the press is essential in creating "mass consciousness."

It is the responsibility of the press to select and present information which will reflect and not distort the truth. For this reason the responsibilities of the press go beyond providing information.

The media must encourage the reader, listener or viewer to critically evaluate and judge the information with which he or she is being provided. If the recipients of information are not critical, no intelligent judgment can be made on any topic. Thought and reflections are necessary if we are to utilize our information and knowledge effectively.

It is hoped that the media will always encourage discussion, dialogue, debate, controversy, and diversity, for any rational society demands constant self-criticism. Where the media does not engender discussion or merely presents a "party-line", intelligent government will quickly disappear.

This double role of the press to provide information and encourage reflection could be described as an attempt to create "political and social consciousness among all members of society" (to use Marxist jargon).

The CFRC Public Affairs Department makes a humble contribution to this very demanding task. We try to provide information on issues and events ranging in scope from international politics to campus events.

We have one programme which is produced by CFRC in Toronto, and which covers topics of general interest with a guest and a panel of interviewers. The interviewers are Gordon Sinclair, Arthur Cole, and Bob Hesketh. The conversation is usually pretty lively and guests and topics are often of considerable interest. This programme, called Let's Discuss It, can be heard Fridays at 8 p.m. on CFRC 1490 and Saturdays at 1 p.m. on CFRC-FM, 91.9.

At 7 p.m. every Saturday CFRC airs Overview, where topics and issues of special interest to the campus and city communities are presented. This programme has a wide scope and is produced entirely at CFRC. It can be heard on both AM and FM frequencies.

Sunday Commentary can be heard Sunday evenings at 7:30 p.m. on CFRC AM and CFRC FM. This programme has a news-magazine format and features interviews with various personalities from Jamie Avis and Ross Sutherland to John K. Galbraith, Keith Norton and various professors on the campus. On Sunday Commentary we present editorial which we hope will encourage discussion and thought among our audience. Please join us every weekend at CFRC.

London Sinfonietta

Impeccable performance by ensemble

by Fenela Childs

On Wednesday, October 27, Grant Hall hosted the London Sinfonietta, regarded by many as one of the world's leading chamber ensembles. The Sinfonietta, formed in 1968, is presently on the last leg of its first world tour, having visited such countries as Germany, Australia, New Zealand, and the United States. Famed primarily for its interpretation of modern composers, the ensemble confirmed this reputation on Wednesday evening. Its performance of a varied and demanding selection of works was well-nigh impeccable.

The first of the five compositions performed by the Sinfonietta was by British composer Harrison Burtwistle: his Ut Heremita Solus. This is a skilfully-orchestrated arrangement of an early sixteenth century work. The instruments performing it in this case included flute, clarinet, viola, cello, piano, and glockenspiel - a rather odd, but surprisingly effective combination. The glockenspiel in particular lent added interest, contrasting effectively with the lower, more solid notes of the piano. The overall effect was both modern and ancient - a stately court masque given a new flavour.

Continuing in a vaguely chronological order, the second work on the programme, and one of the stars of the evening, was Mozart's Oboe Quartet in F major. The exceptional handling of the oboe was especially obvious with the solos in the second movement, and again with the fast runs in the third. Slight problems in tuning were apparent in the pitch transitions between the oboe and the violin, but, on the whole, it was a very impressive performance, and well-received by the audience.

The most controversial, and perhaps least-pleasing of the evening's selections was the Quatro Fantasia by Hans Werner Henze, one of the most well-known of modern German composers. The work seemed rather discordant, lacking any consistent theme or rhythm. The movements had a tendency to trail off into sudden silence, and the whole work came across as rather perplexing and uninteresting. Although their execution of this technically difficult piece was excellent, one had the impression that the performers were similarly uninspired.

With the second half of the programme, the style became more traditional again with the presentation of Wagner's Siegfried Idyll. As its title suggests, the tone of this work was lyrical and pastoral. Its focus was upon the theme from the third act of the opera Siegfried, and numerous variations on this motif were repeated throughout. The strings were particularly effective here, with an impressive lightness and delicacy of technique.

The final piece on the evening's programme, and the most effective, was Stravinsky's Soldier's Tale. This is a nine-part work, incorporating a tremendous variety of musical styles, from Spanish dances to American ragtime. Each part was complete in itself, with a unique theme and tempo. The virtuosity of the performers was especially evident in this selection, which demanded a high degree of skill on the violin, and elicited some excellent pyrotechnics from the trumpet. The finishing touch came from the percussionist, a really spectacular drum solo. A good way to end an excellent performance and a most memorable evening.

Folk Society to meet

Mini-hoot at the Grounds?

The Canadian Folk Music Society (CFMS) consists of people from Vancouver to Charlottetown who share an interest in the maintenance, performance and study of the folk music traditions of Canadian people.

The annual gathering of CFMS members—ballad singers and banjo lovers, composers and teachers, collectors and researchers—is occurring at Queen's University, October 29-30.

Friday evening (8:30 p.m.) there will be a concert of Ethnic Music and Dance presented by affiliates of the Kingston and District Folk Arts Council.

Austrian, Danish, Italian, Polish, Ukrainian, Scottish and East Indian dancers and musicians will be participating. Admission is free but donations to defray expenses of the performers will be welcome.

The "mini-conference" theme, "Canadian folk music and education" will be the focus of Saturday morning workshop-discussion groups. Under the leadership of noted folk music collectors and editors, Barbara Cass-Beggs and Edith Fowke, participants are invited to share their ideas on such subjects as "Canadian folk music on radio and TV", "Urban folk and the school curriculum", "Folk songs suitable for preschoolers" and many more. Both Friday evening and Saturday morning events will take place in Harrison LeCaine Hall (Music Dept.).

On Saturday evening (8 p.m.), the CFMS, in collaboration with Bitter Grounds will present an evening of traditional and contemporary Canadian folk music. Folk musicians from Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, and Kingston will be performing at Clark Hall. Admission is $1.50. Bitter Grounds members pay $1.00.

A special invitation is extended to Queen's students and staff.

At Agnes Etherington

French lithography is a real coup

In Agnes Etherington there is an art show, the calibre of which mild-mannered Kingston has never seen the like. It is a major international exhibition direct from Paris, being shown until the end of November here on campus.

In the words of Michael Bell, one of the show's creators, it is a "recreation of a moment in history". The time is 1824, the place Paris, France. The historical event is the first separate, internationally-recognized lithography show ever.

This show, as it was seen in 1824 is recreated in Agnes Etherington. It has been made possible by the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, and the work of McAllister Johnson and Michael Bell. Michael Bell explained that Mr. Johnson had worked for ten years at the Bibliothèque, and it was only because of the rapport he established with the gallery that the exhibition was allowed to come here.

This show contains the original lithographs of some of the age's great artists. Lithography is grease-pencil drawing on soapstone. The stone is wet, the ink greasy, so the oily ink adheres to the oily crayon lines and repels the water-wet area. A paper is pressed on top to pick up the ink.

Historically, lithography is very significant. It allows for inexpensive mass-reproduction of art by great masters.

Displaying the popular interests of Paris in 1824 and recreating the first international lithography exhibition in history, this show is historically and artistically outstanding.

Lithography was invented by a man who wanted a cheap quick method of printing music. It didn't take long until the process was applied to art. In terms of reproduction lithography has two advantages over all other engraving methods; it is cheap and the artist can make his own print, instead of the artist's making a draft and the engraver's making the print. In lithography there is no longer this intermediate man and one can appreciate the artist directly.

Art was a very fashionable thing to be interested in at this time in Paris and great salons were held every few years to exhibit all the latest works. The first lithographs were seen in the salon of 1817 with engravings. Again, they were a part of the salons of 1819 and 1822. But in the salon of 1824 lithography formed a separate entity in the exhibition, putting it on a level with painting and sculpture and the other traditional art forms.

The lithographic section of the salon of 1824 which represents a profound moment in the history of art is in Agnes Etherington until the end of November. It is a very exciting show.

New local theatre group emerges

Can Pendragon survive at home and tour as well?

by Eric Hughes

If you don't know exactly how to take this statement, you're not alone. Up until now, Pendragon has been little more than a rumour being spread through the Kingston theatrical community. However, the coming out process is picking up speed with a publicity drive designed to peak in the middle of the month.

Pendragon is a new theatre group operating out of Kingston. Not another theatre! Yes, but not to panic says founding member David Fanstone. "Actually, it will be a road company, much like Theatre 5. We'll try things out here and take them on the road. We had some good contacts here and there are some fairly nice people in Kingston. Also, we could get a space here" - that being Brewery Lane, the Theatre 5 space.

In its first press release, Pendragon is described as reviving "the meaning of co-operative play production." Fanstone says, "The money has come totally from the company members on a shareholder system. You put your money in and get a contract and receipt. At the end of the show, everyone still interested gets a percentage of the profits. If you want out, you can get your initial investment back. The idea is to stay amateur now and pay people later.

Who are these people? Were they auditioned? Fanstone again: "No. I knew them all before and had worked with them on previous productions. Some are Queen's people, some from the Kingston community."

Couldn't this lack of auditioning lead to a cliquishness on the part of the company, or resentment from other members of the theatre community? Fanstone does not see it this way. "I prefer to think that it would lead to 12 or 13 people who know what's going on." As far as the theatre community is concerned, "There was an initial negative reaction, but since then we've had offers of materials and money if it's needed, (although, I hope it won't be)."

The first show, "Love's Labour's Won" was written by Fanstone and is directed by Ralph Peter. "The play concerns an old Shakespearean actor, who, forced to retire against his will, wants to end it all. His plan is to commit suicide during the last act of a lost play by the Bard: "Love's Labour's Won." He has difficulty casting the piece however, since all of his actors are well into their seventies, so two of his henchmen kidnap a band of nuns to play the women's roles." The play is termed a "modern verse comedy."

The budget for the show is $1500, and this money has already been raised. All that is needed now is enough profit to finance the play's projected tour to Niagara Falls where the group will play in January at a Firehall Theatre, and to other parts, as yet unknown. There's not much possibility of folding after the first show, as opening night costs are paid, and to simply break even, only the $1500 has to be raised, this at $3 a ticket over an eight day run. Says Fanstone: "If you can't do that, you may as well fold anyway."

Everything makes sense on paper. However, this is a homegrown show produced by a new, so far unknown group of people with no proven box office draw, playing against the shows at the Drama Department, the Domino theatre and the Kinsmen at that time; three established groups presenting three established plays with established Kingston performers. Fanstone thinks the group's chances are excellent. "Being realistic, we are trying to sell tickets on a personal basis through the cast to everybody they can find. Besides, I think it's a good play with an excellent cast." He thinks people may come to see them "fall flat on their faces," but will see differently.

Returning to Kingston to appear in the play will be Doug Stratton, a Queen's graduate who has been performing on the professional stage since 1974. The play will be performed at the Brewery Lane theatre, 370 King St. West from Nov. 18-20 and Nov. 23-27. Curtain time will be 8:30. A public reception will be held following the opening performance, with a special appearance by the Canadian actress Dinah Christie. Tickets are available at the performing arts box office, from cast members, and selected downtown locations.

Steve Goodman ignites a willing audience

by Liz Wood

Steve Goodman. From the first notes of his first number, an audience knows what kind of a performer he is; it feels that incredible excitement that comes with the anticipation of the evening of singing and playing yet to come. Goodman gave a superlative concert on Monday night at MacArthur Hall, perhaps one of the best of his career; this despite a mediocre turnout that made up for its small size with relaxed enthusiasm. It certainly was a happy change to witness a Queen's-Kingston audience clapping time to the first number instead of waiting for the last.

If the audience was ready for Goodman, he was more than ready for them. He opened with the old barbershop favourite "It's a Sin to Tell a Lie" and set a humorous up-tempo pace that gave the crowd a lift and a hint of things yet to come, both vocally and instrumentally.

Goodman is so balanced a performer that it's impossible to concentrate on only one aspect of his talent. At times he approaches instrumental miracles of virtuosity and judgement. Vocally he is well equipped to handle the raunchiest or the most delicate of lyrics, and his between songs patter leads me to believe that he could also become a comedian of some renown.

Though the audience may well have wanted to keep quiet in order to hear the fantastic guitar accompaniment, they roared with laughter at "Chicken Cordon Blues". As "Mercedes Benz" was for Janis Joplin, this is one of Goodman's best 'giveaway' songs. A blues lament about a reluctant health-food-freak girl, it's sung in 12 bar format with a crisp tempo. When merely put in print, "All I got is food for thought" and "This stuff is so strange the cockroaches move next-door," seem 'barely' to emanate the hilarity of the song.

A change of pace gave us a song about honesty and maybe Tommy Duncan too, dedicated to Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys. And later on, an even slower song told us of the loneliness of expatriate Americans living in Central America. The opening joke of "Go down there to get a tan and all you'll see is CIA agents," (obviously a Vietnam era song), turned to sad seriousness as the lyrics informed the listener that no one bought second-hand American dreams down there. His accompaniment echoed in our ears like a full orchestra of acoustic guitars.

"I'm My Own Grandpa" brought gales of laughter as Goodman described an incredible, but friendly consanguinity based on a bizarre marriage (his father's) whose denouement is as fantastic as the song's. A fond satire of "The Blues" (for Wilson Pickett) opened with a facsimile of Otis Redding that was so good, the audience stopped laughing and whooping to listen. It was all a parody, but one which shows those of us who do, why we love the blues, complete with their growls and falsetto howls of anguish. It was also an example of how Goodman's one-liner wit can sometimes get in the way. The next song, an adolescent love lament of haunting melody, was peppered with unwarranted laughs and titters during the first verse. The guitar, however, coalesced so well with the words that it seemed to be speaking with a voice of its own.

It was an evening of reminders as well. Goodman's famous "City of New Orleans" was performed with such gusto and feeling that it left Arlo Guthrie cold and the great Judy Collins sounding a bit amateurish, (if you can imagine that). The song is a protest against the discontinuation of the Illinois Central rail line, about to be taken off the rails at the time the song was written.

"Penny Evans" was sung almost a capella. The song, a statement of a young Vietnam widow, was so well done that numerous people were no doubt grabbing tissues and clenching fists. It gripped Goodman too. He occasionally twanged his guitar, perhaps to ensure himself that he left both feet on the stage; and in a touching act of feeling and involvement, he eased right into the next song, refusing the audience the opportunity to thank him with applause.

"You can't have a country western song without mentioning mothers, trains, prison, trucks, dead dogs and Christmas," exclaimed Goodman, and he managed to coral all that into one song in a spoof of the medium which had everyone laughing on their feet.

The front act, a local band named Comfort played a tight, if simple set

Steve Goodman played an incredible concert at MacArthur on Monday.

The lead vocalist, Georgette Craigie did fair versions of Ronstadt and Emmilou Harris tunes which were perhaps a little too close to the originals. She might do better to do herself, for her voice is good. Most of their songs were country style and steel guitarist Bruce Hamilton really shone, in tight combo with guitarist Bill Joslin. Comfort returned to the stage for Goodman's encores and together they treated the audience to rousing versions of "Johnny B. Good", "Mama Don't Allow," and an ad-libbed version of "Kingston Blues". A great evening. One wonders about the poor turnout. It's a crying shame, especially when you consider how it might discourage people from holding more concerts in MacArthur Hall. I know it's smaller, and it's on West Campus, but the acoustics are fifty times better than those of Grant Hall.

Contemporary music is alive and well

by James Hipkin

On Tuesday, November 2nd at 8pm, the second of a series of concerts of contemporary music will take place. Most pieces included in these concerts are written and performed by Queen's students and professors.

Discussion is an important part of these concerts, as questions are desired and encouraged by the composers whose music is being played.

On November 2nd, all the music presented will be for the first time. The evening will begin with the "Second Piano Sonata" of fourth-year B. Mus. student Doug Atkinson, performed by his sister Lynn. Five songs for alto voice and piano will be sung by Gail Hohner and accompanied by Mark Sirett.

The middle section includes an aleatoric piece, "Water's Life", by James Hipkin, an electronic piece by Leslie Flynn and Rhonda Sullivan, and a short piece by Victor Sawicki.

Water's Life will be performed by the audience and conducted by members of the Queen's Improvisation Group. This group is interested in new music, art and drama and is always open to new members with new ideas. The short piano piece by Sawicki is the result of several week's work and is in a style completely by itself.

Froude Nilsen's work will finish the session. There will be four short pieces in a popular vein as Nilsen is concerned with humour in music.

These monthly events are to provide an opportunity for the campus and the Kingston community to experience some of the trends in modern music. They also provide an outlet for the composers in Kingston to have their music viewed, listened to, and judged.

The first Tuesday of every month at 8pm in Room 120, Harrison-Lecaine Hall promises to be a time to look forward to.

Dutch National Ballet

An incredible demonstration of dance

by Tony Pepper

Theirs is not the ballet of Degas's softly drawn pastels, of ballerinas in flowing chiffon. Theirs is a ballet of new dimensions, of reinterpretation and innovation.

The first piece of the evening, Hans van Manen's, Metaphors, is a Vasarely, so geometric is its choreographic composition.

The bare stage is illuminated with stark white light, which emanates from the wings. Bands of alternating shadow and light diffuse abstractly over both the dance area, creating contrasting planes, thus giving the stage surrealistic depth, and the dancers in their corresponding costumes of black and white.

The effect is hypnotic. It is like watching a sparkler scintillating at night, or catching a glimpse of a ceramic ballerina's twirling reflection on the mirrored surface of a music box. The pace is quick. The eye wishes to retain all it beholds. But it falters. Our peripheral vision is blurred by the constant movement of the dancers. Consequently, we must content ourselves with the continual shifting of our eyes from one group to the other.

Van Manen forces us to concentrate entirely on his metaphors. We abandon all our senses to the dance. It is only when the music stops, and we slowly emerge from our trance, that we realize how intensely we have involved ourselves with the ballet.

In Twilight, van Manen explores the possibilities of the pas de deux. As in Metaphors, the choreographer has varied the tradition: van Manen's preparation of the ballerina's feet with pumps, instead of the classical points transforms the duet, giving the dance new dimensions. Against the background of John Cage's Penultimate Night, one experiences with the dancers the immediacy of each motion as it is created in response to the improvisation, in a slick dancing style, reminiscent of the 1950's.

But the pumps greatly restrict the ballerina's freedom of movement. The sexual interplay between the two dancers is thus inhibited. Consequently, friction is generated and frustration results. The denouement of the duet, only occurs after the ballerina removes her pumps.

Of all the pieces on last Monday night's program, I feel Twilight could have been better. The dancers might have shown more facial expression, if only to further animate their anxiety. Moreover, the ballet lacked the strong internal crescendo needed to define the moment of denouement. A sense of excitement should have accompanied the ballerina's removal of her pumps. The act could have been climactic with the resolution neatly following. Instead, the potential of the moment is left undeveloped, and the discarding of the dancer's pumps is less than tantalizing.

Dantzig's, Epitaph is truly a great ballet. As a sardonic portrait of the holy state of matrimony; it has great depth and spawns visions of dark beauty.

Danced to the ethereal music of Gyorgi Ligeti (Atmospheres and Volumina), Epitaph provides a constant stream of surrealistic images, each of which revolves around the constant themes of love and death, decay and disease. Demonic brides in dresses white with their graves and join in the dance of death; bridegrooms shrivel up on their way down the aisle; and an ominous black box slides forward at the end of the ballet enveloping the convoluting ensemble of dancers, leaving the brides alone praying at the altar.

The final piece, and the Dutch

National Ballet's most recent composition (first performed by the D.N.B. on October 6, 1976.) is a spoof on classical ballet. The comic relief of Toer van Schayk's, First Aerial Station nicely offset the pessimistic gloom of Epitaph. "First Aerial Station" refers to archaic ballet terminology, which today would be referred to as "first position on pointe".

Van Schayk says his ballet is looking for new ways, developing the technique of point-dance and turned away from the frozen dignity, the dusty heroes and gods which were the characteristics of the genre noble, the established style since Court of Louis XIV."

Van Schayk expresses this "minor revolution" not only through the broadly comic gestures and actions of his dancers, but as well, through the artificiality of the dance studio, flatly painted on a crop cloth, where the revolution purportedly takes place.

Furthermore, van Schayk dramatizes the actual moment of change. Through the use of a gawdy, wheel-squeaking chariot, he depicts rococo as the creaking vehicle of ballet. The chariot's continual failure to meet its objective is nicely animated through the maiden's inability to bestow her laurel wreath on the head of her hero. After three uneventful attempts, the maiden's frustration results in her abandonment of her chariot, her splendid robes and her laurel wreath. She is now free to dance expressively, and modern dance is born.

This final piece is a good example of why the Dutch National Ballet is considered a virtuoso company. Van Schayk uses all his dancers. Unlike so many ballet companies which tend to emphasize only the ballerina, the D.N.B. considers its male dancers to be more than the ballerina's partner. The entire troupe share the limelight, and quite rightly. They are all virtuoso performers.

I can only reiterate what has been before - this constant churning of familiar platitudes into new butter, the daily bread of any theatre critic. Clive Barnes, you are right, the Dutch National Ballet is a major company.

Pilgrimage a success

The Queen's Cross-Country Gaels made their second annual 'pilgrimage' to Bethlehem, (Pennsylvania) last weekend, to compete in the Lehigh University Invitational Meet. Though it was a long way to travel for competition, this race offered the team a unique chance to run against some of the top schools on the American eastern seaboard. Queen's improved considerably over last year's performance, placing fourth out of nine finishing teams, behind Villanova University, the Philadelphia Pioneer Club and our hosts from Lehigh.

The 10,000-metre course was identical to last year's: flat, grassy and very fast. Whereas we managed to place only three runners in the top 30 in 1975, this year we managed three in the top 18. Furthermore, those three all improved their previous times by between 30 seconds and one minute.

Queen's top man was Adam Shoemaker who took 11th place, and 10 seconds back in 12th position was team-mate, Claus Rinne. Bob McCormack ran well to clinch 18th spot (but unfortunately, just missed out on a medal which was awarded to the top 15 finishers). Roger Wheate and Mike Deguda were clustered farther back in 34th and 35th places respectively.

An open five mile race commenced just after the championship competition, and Queen's fielded three runners in it. Dale Friesen took 15th place, Max Barr finished 17th and Dave Grant, crossed the line 25th. In all, Coach Walter Eadie and Manager, Curt Bolton were pleased with the results, in view of the team's improvement and the calibre of the all-American competition.

Lehigh was the final meet of the season to prepare the team for the O.U.A.A. Championship race, which takes place tomorrow, October 30th, at Western. All indications are that the provincial title will be a three way battle between Queen's, Western, and U. of T. The final promises to be one of the closest in years, and everyone is keeping their fingers crossed that the Gaels may put together a winning combination.

Golden Gals hot on the dribble

This past weekend the Queen's Golden Gals played host to the Ottawa Bytowners, in two pre-season exhibition games. The experienced Ottawa team had their hands full as the young Queen's team displayed talent and potential, defeating the visitors decisively in both games. We ended up with a 20-point margin in the first game Saturday morning with a score of 63-44. It took a little longer to get our feet moving in the second game, but we managed to pull ahead again, this time winning by a twelve point margin—55 to 43.

New behind the bench this year is Coach Debbie Holts, a grad student here at Queen's. She has put together a very young team with only four returning veterans—Penny Wedd, Sue Gillies, Mary Bruntou, and Kim Headford. Half of the players on the team are in their first year at Queen's—Sue Armstrong, Ann Cox, Janice Deakin, Cathy Fox, Gail Gunning and Debbie Moore.

Eva Stewart returns to the team after a two year absence and our yearly import from Laurentian has arrived in the person of Donna Roman. Rounding out the team is a familiar face, Kathy Keely, an ex-player who this year is bestowing her wealth of knowledge and unyielding stabilizing influence upon us in the capacity of assistant coach.

The team finishes off its pre-season games this coming weekend with an invitational tournament in Guelph and opens the regular season at home, Friday, November 5, 6:30 p.m., against the defending Canadian University Champions, Laurentian.

New men's B-ball league

Queen's is to have a new Basketball League. It is being organized as part of the Men's Intramural Program here at Queen's. It is open to all male staff and students who like to play basketball but don't want to play city league or Bews (Men's Intramurals).

This recreational basketball league will emphasize participation and de-emphasize highly competitive play. If you're interested why don't you get a couple of your friends, a couple of staff members and students, decide who will be your contact person (team manager) and enter your team today.

Games will be played Sunday evening between 6 p.m. and 9:30 p.m., starting Sunday, November 14 (No Bews, Intercollegiate or City League players are allowed.)

Entries must be submitted to the Recreation Office by 3:00 p.m. on Monday, November 8. No late entries will be accepted.

The Managers' meeting will be held on Tuesday, November 9 at 6:30 p.m. in Seminar A of the P.E. Centre.

At this time we will discuss schedules, rules and general organization. The Recreational Basketball Convenor is Gary Harvey. Messages can be left in Gary's mail box in the Recreation Office (102A) in the P.E. Centre.

Frisbee's Finest

Frisbee throwing is a unique sport that is growing rapidly throughout the world. This is reflected in the freestyle performances given by Jim Kenner and Ken Westerfield, Frisbee's Freestyle Champions.

"Many people have played with a Frisbee but have no idea of the versatility and skillfulness that can be put into such a simple enjoyable activity," says Ken Westerfield. "Competitive Frisbee has really excelled in the States. In Canada we feel that the frisbee breakthrough is here."

Bews News

by Mike Guinlock

In the wake of the elitist attacks on Men's Intramurals and the somewhat vitriolic rebuttal that appeared in this paper on Tuesday, perhaps it is necessary at this time to re-examine the goal of Bews. Is Bews for participation or is the idea of Bews to win? There are points that support both sides of the argument. This column will make no effort to resolve the problem at this time, but it will make a suggestion.

Attacks on the intramural system in the form of Mr. Chenoweth's article serve no purpose at all in solving the problem. People who do not know the whole story get the wrong impression and the wrong facts. The only way problems can be remedied is through the Men's Intramural Athletic Council. It meets once a month and its members are always open to suggestions. If people such as Mr. Chenoweth have some constructive suggestions why don't they channel them through this council instead of the paper.

Last Saturday the Inter-Faculty Softball tournament was held in the Bews Gym. Although there were several close games only one team showed any class such as that shown by the Cincinnati Reds in the recent World Series. PHE was in a class by itself. Led by catcher Bruce McFarlane's bat, Frank Giffin's speed and a solid team defense they overwhelmed all their opponents winning the final over a weak Arts team 4-1.

Saturday will test Queen's new look in w-polo

by Brian Clarke

Queen's University now has a "new" water polo team.

"All the players are now in top condition and I know what everyone can play," said coach Simon Beitler.

"The team looks good together - they never get tired. They are a new team."

After almost a month of swimming, shooting and passing practice coach Beitler feels he has come up with one of the best teams he has ever coached.

Saturday afternoon the Golden Gaels will have their abilities tested as they compete in the third Ontario University Athletic Association Eastern Section Water Polo Tournament which the Royal Military College is hosting at the Queen's Pool.

Four teams, University of Toronto Blues, York University Yeomen, the Royal Military College Redmen and our own Queen's University Golden Gaels will take part in the round-robin tournament which will last from about noon until 7 p.m.

Queen's first action will be against RMC at 12:30 p.m. in the first game of the tournament.

The Gaels stiffest competition is expected to come from the U. of T. Blues. Captained by George Gross Jr., a former member of Canada's Olympic team, the Blues gave Queen's its only loss at the last OUAA tourney held here.

Toronto will meet Queen's in the third game of the tournament at 2:35 p.m.

Coach Beitler believes that for his Gaels to beat the Blues they must be tactful and have plenty of speed.

"The only way we can improve our tactics is from playing tough," said coach Beitler, and that's one thing this year's Gaels will do more of than they have in the past. After OUAA competition concludes in late November, Queen's will enter the Ottawa Valley Water Polo League.

"I have decided that in order for the players to maintain their present ability and to improve we will play all year long," said coach Beitler. "The team will be divided into two. I will play with six others on a senior team, while the younger players and freshmen will form another."

In the Ottawa Valley League the two Queen's teams will compete against Nepean, Bayshore and Gloucester, as well as the University of Ottawa and Carleton University.

Queen's men water polo players haven't been the only ones practicing in the pool lately, the women are also out in full force.

Women's water polo coach Chris Whetely, a five year veteran of his Queen's men's team, presently in his third year of Medicine, has taken on the job of getting the girls into shape for their upcoming competition.

"There are about 20 girls out for the team, and some have as much as three years experience while for others it's their first year," said coach Whetely.

Since the girls first major competition isn't until after Christmas, when Queen's will host an Invitational Women's Water Polo Tournament, most of their practices are for conditioning and working on fundamentals right now.

Last Saturday the girls gained experience as they had their first scrimmage of this season against a team from Ottawa at Queen's.

Gaels w-polo ready and waiting for tests ahead.

Yankees back but Reds the best

CAC'S CORNER

by Chris Chenoweth

If a citizen of the United States was asked "What represents America?", inevitably one of his chosen symbols would be the New York Yankees. The Yankees seem to follow the lifeblood of the nation. Big winners in the 1930's, '40's and '50's, the Yankees plummeted by 1965, as did Lyndon Johnson's Great Society. But the Yankees have finally returned, and America's imagination has once more been re-awakened in a big way.

Sure, they lost the series in four straight to the Reds (Commiss?) But those boys in pinstripes have received more ink than the Reds or any other team in baseball. Most importantly, there is little doubt that the Yankees will stay on top for many years to come, and eventually cop a Series title.

Why? Because the Yankees are more than just a baseball team - they are tradition, a part of the American dream, which is as wholesome as Mom's apple pie. Their players don't just win games, they drive for victory with a daring that captures the American ideal of individualism.

The New York manager, Billy Martin, embodies a rough and tumble spirit that most sports figures, especially the Reds' Sparky Anderson, lack. After all, how many managers have punched out their leading pitcher in a bar room brawl, or have been fired from three clubs in a managing career - each club having won a pennant or come close under Martin the year before? Nobody but Billy Martin could come back and win yet another pennant with his fourth new ball team, this time the New York Yankees.

A rundown of the Yankee personnel also exemplifies this courage and talent. At catcher, Thurman Munson has proved consistently he's the best in baseball. Not only has he batted over .300 for the last seven years, but this season Munson hit over sixty points better than his National League rival, Johnny Bench, and he overhauled Bench in the All Star voting yesterday. I'll take Munson over Bench any time. At first base Chris Chambliss showed he can swing the big bat in style reminiscent of Lou Gehrig. Willie Randolph is a young, quick second baseman with All-Star qualities, while Craig Nettles led the league in home runs. Shortstop Fred Stanley proved he can do the job under pressure, although the Yankees will be hunting for a younger, speedier replacement in the winter talks.

The outfield may not be as strong as Cincinnati's, but certainly it is the best in the American League. Roy White and Lou Pinella, as the only real remnants of the Ralph Houk era, have been the veteran leaders of the club. Mickey Rivers is certainly the fastest and most aggressive centerfielder in baseball, as his 43 stolen bases and 89 RBI's as leadoff batter illustrate. Eighty nine runs batted in a

by Michael Fitzgibbon

The bustling town of Cincinnati, Ohio is a happy place these days, for their heroes are the World Champions of Baseball again. The heroes of course, are the devastating Cincinnati Reds, well-known throughout the world of baseball.

Fans refer to their team as "The Big Red Machine" and no baseball club will disagree with the title. The Big Red Machine completed their 4 game sweep of the puzzled New York Yankees with a 7-2 rounding last Thursday night in Yankee Stadium. In doing so, the Reds became the first National League team in 54 seasons to win consecutive world titles, and the first team in 10 years to sweep a World Series.

The youthful Yankees saw this dream of climbing atop the baseball globe quickly and neatly erased by the Reds. The National League Champions completely outran, outthit and outclassed their pinstriped opponents. New York's pitchers were battered by the Reds power, as Cincinnati outscored the Yanks 22-8.

Make no mistake about it, the Cincinnati Reds are Number 1. Their attack is based mainly on power. The club is sturdy at every position and has bench strength which makes the infield is completed with pesky and accurate Dave Concepcion at shortstop. Tony Perez plays a mean first base and is another big RBI man for the team.

Cincinnati's pitching staff cannot boast of 20 game winners. Gary Nolan, Don Gullett, Fred Norman, Jack Billingham and Pat Zachry are good, stable hurlers. Pedro Borbon round up a reliable bullpen with which the National League is well acquainted.

There are a few barriers which the Reds will have to hurdle in the future if they are to remain champs. Aging Tony Perez will probably be traded to an American League club to serve as a designated hitter. Pete Rose has been rumored to be unhappy with salary negotiations, and Don Gullett's free agent status could land him another team.

If the Big Red Machine can repair these kinks, then the National League teams are going to have another frustrating and long year. The well-organized and close knit Reds are just too damn good.

Joe Morgan sums up his teams best, "The key to our success is that while we have individual strength, we are a team. We don't panic and we don't do many things wrong." Just ask the New York Yankees.

Wasteful Doctors

Health Minister Frank Miller has indicated that Ontario doctors who order massive tests for every patient will be shown just how much it costs the health systems. Mr. Miller told the Ontario Hospitals Association's annual meeting that hospitals will be asked to tell patients when they leave the hospital roughly what their bill to the Ontario Health Insurance Plan totals.

This is part of an attempt to make people aware of the system. Mr. Miller pointed out that even the doctors are often unaware of the cost. Profiles have been developed to show the doctors who order the testing just what it is costing. He indicated that more forceful measures would be used before long but refused to specify what they would be.

Mr. Miller told the OHA that money would still be tight but he does not anticipate the repetition of 1976 cutbacks.

Mackasey in Quebec

Bryce Mackasey, the former Postmaster-General, has officially entered the Quebec provincial elections. His departure from the Commons leaves five vacancies, giving the Liberals 135, Conservatives 96, New Democrats 16, Social Credit 11 and Independents 1 seat.

Mr. Mackasey, in a news conference announcing his decision, stated that the Parti Quebecois has "the only logical position" with regards to language policy. He also advocated discontinuing language proficiency tests for immigrant children, but also said these children should have to attend French schools.

Mr. Mackasey denied he had set conditions for his entry into provincial politics and stated, "the decision to come to Quebec was my own", in answer to questions as to whether he was sent in by the federal Liberals. He will run in the Montreal riding of Notre Dame de Grace, held for the past ten years by William Tetly, the former Public Works Minister.

End Unemployment?

Edward Broadbent, New Democratic Party leader, called upon the government to accept NDP policy which he claims will eliminate unemployment in four years. The basis of the plan is to "substitute jobs for handouts". He said funds would mostly be recovered by increased production and lower unemployment insurance and welfare claims. The statement is the first of several party policy papers developed since the fall of 1975. The NDP created the policies to fill in what they call a void left by the Progressive Conservatives. The Conservatives at present are refusing to put forth policy decision.

The paper presented five major points:
-Cut personal income taxes for lower and middle incomes to stimulate buying power.
-Reactivate federal capital works projects.
-Expand capital budgets for low income housing and land assembly.
-Launch a government-backed repair program for homes of pensioners, the disabled and low income earners.
-Start a program to insulate and improve federal buildings, which would also conserve energy.

New Country

The first President of the Republic of Transkei took office on Tuesday, and predicted in his inaugural address that his country would soon be recognized by the rest of the world. Transkei, on the south-eastern coast of Africa, was granted its independence by South Africa so far the only country to exchange ambassadors with it has been South Africa.

Canada still has not recognized Transkei, saying that it is under the control of South Africa and is not truly independent.

The blacks of Transkei are glad to have achieved freedom from the apartheid system of South Africa, but as yet are unsure exactly what to do with their freedom.

Lebanon

Syria is to dominate the Arab peace keeping force of 30,000 to be established in Lebanon. The announcement came after two days of argument at a summit meeting in Cairo of Arab leaders. No immediate details were given for the exact composition of the force. This was interpreted to mean that Syria would dominate the peace keeping force, and tacit confirmation of Syria's intervention in Lebanon.

The summit was composed of 14 heads of state plus senior officials from most of the other nations and the PLO. It was seen as the most serious and ambitious attempt on the part of the Arab world to stop the 18-month Lebanese war.

Remembrance Day

The location of the Kingston Remembrance Day Service has been changed from the Kingston Memorial Centre to the Cross of Sacrifice in MacDonald Park. The park provides a suitable atmosphere with its four memorials and the only inconvenience is the lack of shelter in case bad weather shows up.

November 11 falls on a Thursday this year. Local Roman Catholic schools will close for Thursday and the county public school system will close for Friday.

For those who wish to attend the service, it will start at 10:30 a.m. at MacDonald Park. Veterans' associations, Legion branches, the armed forces, and Boy Scout and Girl Guide groups will be among those attending the non-denominational service.

Extradition

John Patrick O'Sullivan, 29, presently serving a five-year jail term in Millhaven for holdups in Jasper and Newboro in 1973, will be extradited to the United States when his sentence here is complete.

In the United States he will have to serve a 23-year sentence for the murder of a barmaid in Saigon during his station in Viet Nam. O'Sullivan served 23 months of this sentence before escaping during a temporary leave of absence.

Much has been reported lately about this extradition case. O'Sullivan claims the application by the U.S. government for his extradition is illegal since he is an Irish national and not an American citizen. But since he was subject to the code of military justice until his discharge he can be extradited. The military code does not discriminate on the grounds of nationality. O'Sullivan's other protests were also overruled during the day and a half of proceedings.

Election

Preparations for the December 6 municipal election in Kingston are under way. At this time only Alderman Kenneth Keyes has submitted his candidature for the post of city mayor. Officials fear that if he acquires his post by acclamation voter apathy will just continue to grow in Kingston. The number of voters has steadily grown smaller in the past five municipal elections, with only 22.5 per cent turning out in 1974 when George Speal won the office of mayor by acclamation. This year the city is even having problems finding paid election workers. The city needs five hundred deputy returning officers and poll clerks, who will receive from $35 to $50 a day for their services, but so far only 400 applications have been received.

Another sign of apathy: for a seminar held last weekend at St. Lawrence college to discuss the municipal elections only a dozen people signed up. The meeting was cancelled.

Odds and Ends

Don't forget postal deadlines for Christmas mail.

Winnie-The-Pooh celebrated his fiftieth birthday this year. Or at least the fiftieth birthday after his "creation".

A good car to get hit by is a Jaguar. Far better than by a Rolls-Royce, whose squared-off front would hit your mid-thigh area, knock you down and run you over, or a Mini which would shoot you over its roof and leave you sprawled out for the next car to run you over. The Jaguar would push you along its nice long-nosed hood and leave you safely on the side of the road. Or so says a Canadian pathologist.

Erratum

In last Tuesday's article on the AIB, "$9 million of excess profits" should have read "$9 million of excess revenue".

Western leaves student federation

by Giles Cherson
Students of the University of Western Ontario collectively decided to discontinue their membership in the Ontario Federation of Students according to the results of a referendum held there last Wednesday. Although the positive wording of the question, "Should Western continue to hold membership in the Ontario Federation of Students", was considered by several OFS executive members to be to the advantage of the Federation, Western Students nonetheless rejected the OFS by a margin of 165 3477 ballots were cast. In appraising the verdict of Ontario's second largest campus, Murray Miskin, Chairman of the OFS executive, felt that "OFS" enemies on campus were more committed than our friends."

The campaign of those opposed to OFS at Western - the "NOFS Committee" - essentially harped upon allegations that the nine OFS staff members are over-paid, earning "almost twice what the president of Western's Student Council" does. Posters put up by the committee suggested that Western's $24 266 OFS fee was unproductive on the grounds that the OFS was more concerned with controversial social issues than student interests and was unresponsive to general student criticism of its policies. The posters implied that the $24,000 might preferably be spent on the purchase of 96,904 cups of coffee, among other things.

For its part, the OFS pursued a defensive campaign, which essentially sought to respond to the criticisms levelled by the NOFS Committee. One leaflet, for example, stressed the reasonableness not only of the salaries paid to OFS staff - $213 per week plus a medical dental plan and an allowance for dependents - but of OFS policies, too. It pointed out that the OFS' position on tuition was merely "to make sure that no student who is academically qualified should be denied a university education because of inadequate resources" and also reminded students of OFS' role in the government's freezing of tuition fees for three successive academic years.

Another pamphlet outlined the case for student provincial representation on issues such as housing, student services and financial assistance, a statement which included the views of Queen's AMS President Jamie Avis.

"I am convinced that OFS is maturing as a political force representing our interests, but OFS needs all campuses, including Western, to assist in this process of developing a strong student voice."

Members of the OFS Executive, which convened at Queen's last Saturday, expressed their remorse at the Western decision and concluded that their loss must have been due to a failure in "getting ourselves across to Western students."

Meds get more room early in '78

by Paul Finkel
Completion of Phase I in the construction of the Basic Sciences Health Library Building is scheduled for spring of 1978.

Speaking about the progress of the project to last Thursday's Senate meeting, Dr. H.C. Kelly (Vice-Principal of Health Sciences) said that at the end of the first stage of construction five floors of the building will be operational. To be situated at the corners of Stuart St. and Barrie St., the building is designed to house all the basic science departments, the department of Pharmacy and the Health Science Library. Some other functions of the building will be to provide "medical facilities of a basic nature" offices for the Faculty of Medicine and space for animal research.

The building will not have facilities for clinical research nor will it accommodate the School of Nursing.

Total completion of the project is expected by the spring of 1980, however work on Phase II of construction is presently awaiting consolidation of funds. The operation is being financed by the Ministry of Health.

Susie-Q's sociology

The Women's Liberation Movement still has several significant social attitudes to dissolve before such events as Susie-Q Week at Queen's become unthinkable. Particularly we refer to the social norm of females waiting for males to invite them on dates.

Why this behavioural barrier for young women exists is a question for the sociologists. What is 'natural' in our society, suggests Mrs. Meyer of our Sociology Department, is something we learn as we develop. We have learned that women should wait to be asked out as this is the 'natural' way for people to behave. To reverse the roles, a young woman still feels the anxiety of possibly jeopardizing her chances of being liked in return. She may be seen as aggressive, unfeminine or perhaps even promiscuous by simple virtue of her taking the freedom of approaching a male.

As a problem, this social norm seems most acute at the first-year level where students have the fewest good friends. Susie-Q Week proclaims this social barrier surmountable and helps people come out of their initial shyness.

Such prevalent attitudes are not to be instantly changed at this level in life—we grew up in these beliefs of the propriety of social behaviour. They may be as old-fashioned as the woman's fallen handkerchief or unlit cigarette but they are still with us. And for those who have been socialized to believe that a woman's taking the initial approach is 'unnatural', the Susie-Q celebration is uncommon fun.

If a woman finds a man interesting, why should she have qualms about taking the initiative to approach him for a date? The reason is: young males react in a way which discourages females from doing so. If a female perceives the reaction that she is thought to be 'aggressive', she may have serious doubts about taking the initiative again.

Males and females both, should be socialized in a different fashion to relieve their anxieties about the opposite sex. It is a token privilege for women that one fifty-second of the year should be devoted to such a theme as Susie-Q. The novelty of such activities will continue until children are weaned in a different social climate.

Surely women, even 'alienated freshettes', can be intelligently encouraged to reason that if a male interprets her approach as aggressive, she should reject him as a social anachronism.

The Women's Center has echoed these sentiments and is working with a reasonable understanding of the value of Susie-Q Week.

Queens' future quality

Recently a Principal's Advisory Committee was struck to consider the "present direction, future development and organization of the Queen's University Library system". That such a comprehensive study has not been undertaken for twelve years invites some speculation as to what priority the library system at Queen's holds.

The library is one of the most valuable assets at any university, its size and scope having a significant bearing on both the calibre of student the university can expect to attract - especially at the post-graduate level - and the quality of education to be received.

The Principal's Advisory Committee certainly has an immense task ahead of it. The library system at Queen's presently faces crucial problems on two fronts. The first concerns the maintenance of the present quality of the library system in terms of staffing and acquisition of books and serials. Given the financial constraints imposed upon the university by the Ontario Government, the quality of the library system, not to mention the prospect for improvement, have suffered extensively during the past five years.

Since 1970 library staff has been reduced by 15 percent to 35 positions which represents in most areas a minimum viable staff level.

Currently funding is approximately one half of what would be required to make the same purchases as were made in 1970-71. To put it more starkly over the past five years the acquisition of books by the library has steadily decreased - from 44,198 to 26,470.

Library staff have, commendably, undertaken to cut corners as intelligently as possible, yet the hard facts betray their efforts. If Queen's is to maintain its esteemed position among Canadian universities, the quality of the library system must be improved and under no circumstances be allowed to stagnate, let alone decline.

The second major problem to be confronted by the Principal's Advisory Committee - albeit belatedly - concerns the dire lack of physical space. In anything, the Government's fiscal stringency towards universities has helped defer this problem by several years by forcing a decline in acquisitions. Yet the space problem is now urgent: stack space at Douglas Library will be totally filled by 1979 despite the fact that many of the known techniques for easing the space shortage have already been implemented. Most branch libraries are likewise overcrowded. Obviously the solution to this fundamental problem will not be easily found.

Plans are apparently underway to build a warehouse to store up to 40 percent of the least used books, thereby freeing adequate space on stack shelves for perhaps twelve years of future acquisitions. Under the proposed system, books thus stored would be available within 24 hours of their being demanded.

This proposal can serve merely as a band-aid remedy, one which would again defer the problem for another decade. To face the problem squarely, then, is to admit that Queen's requires another library. The University's downtown location means that such a structure will cost several millions of dollars. Nevertheless it is an indispensable resource for future generations.

We would urge the administration to formulate plans for the construction of a modern library building to be completed by 1990, and to make preparations for an extensive fund-raising campaign directed toward this end. Perhaps a healthy portion of the recently initiated $10 million capital drive might be earmarked for this purpose.

Canada campus notes

Rampant UBC drinking

[CUP] Students at the University of British Columbia reacted quickly and angrily October 21 to the student council's decision the previous day to stop serving beer in the pub for one month. A group of students is organizing a "drink-in" and circulating a petition to protest the action.

Council closed the pub because they felt it was contributing to rowdiness, vandalism and drunken driving. They feared the Liquor Administration Board would revoke the licence permanently if the council did not take action on its own. "If anything, closing the Pit is going to increase drunken driving," said protest organizer John Lowe. "Now students who live in residence are going to have to drive out and back."

Ken Ball, who is working on the petition said the majority of students should not suffer because of a few. Response to the petition shows most students are opposed to the dry up, he said.

Different opinions on the closure are coming out of the council. One representative, David Van Blarcom, said students should not protest the decision because it was made to show that students are concerned about liquor regulation abuse.

Next week council will entertain a motion to reconsider its decision.

Election "too costly"

[CUP] An election to fill the post of student president at Algonquin College has been dismissed as too time-consuming and costly. Council executives will appoint a president instead.

According to council vice-president and acting-president Mike Carroll "we didn't have time to waste" after the October 13 resignation of George Calderone for personal reasons.

Asked if the appointment procedure did not infringe on student rights Carroll said, "we kicked this around but we saw no other sensible way." He added that the council's by-laws allow for the appointment procedure.

He said the cost of the election wouldn't be worth it because, "if we had one, only 17 to 20 percent of the students would turn out to vote anyway."

Carroll pointed out that in February the 8,000 students on Algonquin's seven campuses will once again get a chance to vote.

SFU strike a success

[CUP] Mechanical trades workers at Simon Fraser University have won their seven week strike bid for a shorter work week and increased salary. The contract calls for a 36 1/4 hour work week and an 11 percent wage hike. It now awaits approval from the federal Anti-Inflation Board.

Although SFU remained open during the longest strike ever at a B.C. university it was not without discomfort for students, non-unionized faculty and administrators who crossed picket lines.

Toilets were plugged, piles of garbage dotted the campus and bus commuters faced a daily mile-long walk because bus drivers refused to cross pickets at the foot of Burnaby mountain.

Illegal rents at York?

[CUP] Residents at York university have a chance to take the University to the rent review board for violations incurred when rents were hiked 13.5 per cent last May.

The dispute arose in mid-October when lawyers for the York University Tenant's Association (YUTA) reported the administration had failed to comply with rent review regulations for post-secondary institutions that it: 1) consult with the group representing student tenants before announcing a rent increase, 2) file a statement with the rent review officer certifying that such consultation has taken place and 3) then give notice of the increase to residents.

If this is the case and the 13.5 percent hike becomes illegal the university could not collect this year's rents and individual residents could charge the university with a violation of rent review legislation. Maximum fines of $2,000 per rental unit could be slapped down. The combined fines of all the units, graduate and undergraduate, would be in the millions of dollars.

Susie-Q rapped

The Queen's Women's Centre does not plan to run a "Women's Week in opposition to Susie-Q Week at Queen's," says Ms. Carla Hayes, one of the coordinators of the center. A Women's Week is planned for next term.

Ariadne Symons, chairperson of the Susie-Q Week told the Journal that Susie-Q Week has been attacked by the Women's Center as "demoralizing, degrading and sexist." In fact, this description has been applied to the Queen's Candlelighting Ceremony by the Kingston Women's Center, said Ms. Hayes.

Ms. Symons had said that the Women's Center gave her no favorable response when she approached them. Ms. Hayes said that in fact the opposite was true and that the Women's Center approached the Susie-Q people to make various recommendations about the week.

The Women's Center feels that the social custom of females asking males out on dates should not be exclusively confined to one week of the year. As such, the Center feels that the week is inappropriate in a modern university setting because it makes an artificial situation of a female asking a male out for an evening.

On the other hand, the Center feels that Susie-Q Week serves a purpose in that it helps first-year students overcome some initial shyness.

The Women's Center is preparing a submission for the Journal in which they more fully explain their views on the social problems of Susie-Q week.

Last lecture stresses "discourse, not debate"

by Jennifer Warren

If it were his last chance to address mankind, Dr. W.B. Rice, head of the Department of Mechanical Engineering, would suggest that an absolute pre-requisite to an educational environment is the existence of human discourse as opposed to defensive debate. Dr. Rice will articulate the notion of the need to learn the art of conversation and mutual forbearance, as he kicks off the first lecture in the Last Lecture Series; tonight at 7:30pm in Gordon House Common Room. There will be five informal evenings of lecture and discussion in the series with the theme of "What would you say if it were your last chance to address mankind?" The lectures then, are not limited to any subject area and their talk will not necessarily fall under the rubric of their various academic specialties, which range from Mechanical Engineering to Religion.

Other lecturers in the Last Lecture Series, which will take place on various dates up to December 2, will be Principal R.L. Watts; Rev. Dr. A.M. Lavery, Ms. M.E. Meyer, Chairwoman of Undergraduate studies, Department of Sociology, and Rev. Dr. B.R. Baxter, Head of the Department of Religion and principal of Queen's Theological College.

The series is co-sponsored by the AMS Education Commission which has financed the advertising, and the L.F.R.S. which has been responsible for the organization.

The Last Lecture series did not take place last year due to a lack of organizational enthusiasm, but in 1974 the lectures apparently provoked some thoughtful discussion according to this year's planners. Announcements of the time, place and speakers for the lectures are posted around campus.

Senate studies scholarships, teaching and money options

by Paul Finkel

Principal Watts has announced the appointment of a Principal's Advisory Committee on Teaching Effectiveness. To be headed by Prof. A.R.C. Duncan of the Philosophy department, the committee will attempt to evaluate and improve on the teaching effectiveness within the various faculties and schools.

Queen's University will undertake a study for the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada on "Financing Alternatives and Their Effect on University Excellence." Some of the areas to be investigated are the role of tuition fees, the accessibility of university to the poor and mechanisms for financing degree education. Prof. P.M. Leslie (Political Studies) has tentatively agreed to act as principal investigator for the project.

Two new scholarships have been approved by the Senate Committee on Student Aid. They are the J.J. Russell Memorial Prize in Philosophy and the Grand Lodge of the Order of Sons of Italy of Ontario Scholarship in Italian. Also referred to the Senate Committee on Academic Development was a proposal to introduce a medal concentration in Italian. This course taken in conjunction with a medal concentration in another subject would lead to a BA (Honours) degree.

Get out and vote

by Jodi Button

Kingston enumeration took place between September 7 and September 30 which should include all those in residence and many in off-campus housing. Anyone taking up living arrangements of either nature between September 7 and October 12 is considered eligible to vote.

You may have noticed the posting of the preliminary list of electors on various telephone poles on and off campus. If you find that you are not included, you have until Friday, November 5th, which is the final day for filing applications for revision of the Preliminary List, to have your name added. This involves a jaunt to City Hall and the filling out of an application.

Failing this, there are two alternatives left. Up until November 15, a certificate can be obtained from the City Hall which you will carry with you to the polls and which will give you eligibility to vote.

Otherwise you are welcome to walk into the polls on December 6, and providing there are not throngs of students there with the same idea, you will be permitted to make the suitable arrangements and vote on the spot.

Depending on the circumstances of each polling station this could be a little risky and you would be advised to choose one of the first two methods if you want to be guaranteed a vote on December 6.

Errata

In the article appearing in the Queen's Journal of Tuesday, October 26 regarding the swine flu immunization symposium conducted at Queen's on October 21 the following information was incorrectly reported.

The thirty four deaths in the United States referred to in the report were not the result of swine flu. These people had been immunized against swine flu because of their high risk but died of natural causes.

Asthma response to the swine flu vaccine is rare.

Children under 12 years of age, if immunized, run the risk of temperature rises with the complication of convulsions.

The article stated that there are currently 40,000 available doses of swine flu vaccine in Ontario. This figure in fact refers to a chemical used for people who have come into contact with the flu, usually those working in an institution.

The headline, too, may be misinterpreted to suggest that the vaccine itself is medically insufficient to deal with the swine flu virus which is incorrect. There is an insufficient number of doses of the vaccine in the province at the moment but the pharmaceutical manufacturers are working on it.

Another erratum: Harry Parrott did not tell the journal that he wanted to see tuition pegged at 70 percent of the cost of a university education. The figure should have read 20 percent.

Watts hopes for loyalty

by Chris Hall

In his convocation address, Principal Watts congratulated the part-time students, graduated Saturday October 13th, for their persistence and hard work.

He stressed the importance of part-time students at Queen's by noting that Queen's was the pioneer of part-time studies in Canada. Principal Watts went on to explain how former principal John Deutsch began his studies at Queen's as a part-time student.

The address also centered on present-day issues concerning Queen's. The principal expressed hopes that all the graduates had learned to express themselves clearly, especially in light of recent articles claiming that Queen's students were illiterate.

Becoming serious, Principal Watts stressed the fact that Queen's graduates have played an important role in Canadian society. Queen's University has turned out a long history of leaders who are fiercely loyal to their alma mater. This loyalty is especially important to Queen's today, because of financial constraints imposed on all universities.

Queen's is engaged in a constant struggle to maintain its standard of excellence. The principal closed his address by expressing confidence that these graduates also will be leaders in Canadian society.

Grandson of Principal Grant returns

Queen's not Multiversity

by Anne Johnson

At a speech to those attending the 10:00 a.m. session of Fall Convocation, Mr. George Grant, recipient of an honorary Doctor of Laws degree, said he was very much honoured to return to the university he so much cared about. As a 1939 first-class honours history graduate of Queen's and Rhode Scholar, Dr. Grant remarked that he was glad he had been educated at Queen's University. According to Grant, "Queen's is, par excellence, a Canadian university," one where its students come from all across the country, and from all sorts and conditions of life. He believes it is still that way. During his stay at Queen's as well he became a social democrat, but not in the political sense. "Social democracy," he said, "is the great force of the people of society to restrain the kind of technological tyranny we are moving towards."

In his university years, Queen's was still what he termed "a University and not a Multiversity," an institution which places teaching and knowing at its centre rather than an institution which is more like a production factory. He hopes Queen's has not turned into the latter type in the way some universities have. In his classes, he was taught to really think, as most faculties were, about things other than technology. He especially hoped this tradition had been kept alive at Queen's.

Dr. Grant is the grandson of a former principal of Queen's, George M. Grant, the namesake of Grant Hall. He has written numerous books and articles, and is a controversial spokesman on Canadian nationalism. He is currently a Professor of Religion at McMaster University.

Munnings: Pioneer in education

by Carol Good

"We live in a world in which the computer holds almost as many mysteries as the human mind, in a world in which technology can barely keep pace with itself, a world in which education is virtually determined by the very requirements of technology." So said Gladys R. Munnings Arts '33 in an address to the graduating class at Convocation last Saturday. Miss Munnings was presented with an honorary Doctor of Laws by Principal Watts.

Her speech on Saturday analysed the trends in education since the middle sixties. The graduates, she suggested, were in excellent position "to assess the results of the thinking and pressures of the past few years." To begin an analysis of education, one must realize that "the schools (and universities) are always blamed for society's ills and are given the major responsibility for curing them."

The major trend began in 1962, when the Reorganized Program of Studies was introduced. This was followed by a series of studies examining various policies such as teacher education and special education for the handicapped. According to Miss Munnings, "in the late 60's and early 70's the wild swing of the pendulum away from the discipline of structures and authority resulted from a somewhat spoiled, affluent society rebelling against controls in whatever form, core curriculum, supervision, the discipline of hard work, external examinations..."

Ontario adopted the bandwagon approach to these education problems. But, Miss Munnings said "the pace and rhythm of modern life often lead to impatience and lack of precision in detail and planning." A period of consolidation is now beginning and the consequences of the past decade are going to be reviewed and evaluated. Then perhaps with more careful planning, the goals of education will be attainable.

Miss Munnings also spoke of the illiteracy controversy and the value of the proper use of the English language, as she said "ideas are great or persuasive only when they can be expressed with clarity and grace." She also felt that it is the graduates' responsibility to back the schools and universities when they take a stand demanding a standard of vocabulary and expression in keeping with the students' abilities.

Along with literacy, she also voiced her opinion about the value of bilingualism. "Language is so essential to understanding and cooperation between races in our present multicultural society that the aim should be to foster not only bilingualism, but the knowledge of a third language as well, wherever possible." Miss Munnings felt that unfortunately "the pursuit of excellence as an inherent factor in the development of the well-rounded human being went out of fashion in the late 60's and early 70's

Vic Lee: A paragon of patience

Dear Editor:

There is one man on this campus who never seems to get the recognition or praise he deserves and that's Mr. Vic Lee. Being a 'dumb frosh', I've only seen Mr. Lee at work for just over a month now but he has really impressed me as a reliable, good-natured and extremely (overly?) tolerant guy who can always crack a joke or give us a gentle ribbing late at night (early in the morning) as we girls of Victoria Hall walk, stagger, crawl or are carried in, according to our state of inebriety. How many people do you know who would take as much abuse and patience-testing as Mr. Lee, without flinching and still keep a civil tongue?

But just because he doesn't flinch let alone explode doesn't mean he is less of a person - whom we should respect, and that's where the problem lies. In return for all the shit he lets us get away with, the 'men' of this university, in general, seem to think that it's part of their image to jump on the bandwagon and harass Mr. Lee and his fellow workers, kick in doors, smash windows, etc. and then criticize and make derogatory remarks about him not only amongst themselves but in the papers too. I'm sure there would be many funny guys on this Campus keeping their teeth in a glass at night if they'd had to be dealt with by someone other than Mr. Lee during some attempts at rowdiness.

The question now is how much can (or should) he be expected to take? We're bloody lucky to have someone as understanding and persevering (even in the most provoking situations) as Mr. Lee. The women of Vic Hall, if no one else, should be the first to realize this and don't forget that some of you girls now living off Campus had your safety at night resting with Mr. Lee last year, or the year before.

I hope that in the future there will be more thought before making those infantile judgements and statements about Mr. Lee for a few cheap laughs. To put it mildly, the residents of Victoria Hall would be up shit's creek if it weren't for his superhuman patience and I urge you all to give Mr. Lee the credit and admiration which is long overdue for the superb job he is doing.

Name withheld by request

He still doesn't exist

Dear Editor:

It said "God isn't dead, he never lived." Although the article didn't proceed to address itself directly to this point, it did indirectly corroborate its title. After describing George Orwell's "thought police" and "Big Brother" as the ultimate surveillance method, the argument went that Orwell's "contrived diabolical weapon" "wasn't really new as Christianity put God behind your shoulder 2000 years ago." The inference deliberately intended was that God was a "contrived diabolical weapon" - contrived as in "invented", "created", or "conjured up".

In his reply, Gord Taylor has persuaded me that in labelling the modern day church as "devoid of social utility" I was somewhat heavy handed. Perhaps the church does do more than provide a local social club, and for this reason possibly it deserves our support. However, so long as the social contribution must be framed with reference to a mythological God, I question its net good will.

In the past few days many people have asked me "how I could believe in nothing." To discount God as an entity, a creator, or "what have you" is not to be without beliefs - rather it is to be without beliefs that ascribe their foundations to something spiritual (non-existent in my thinking) or divine (equally non-existent). You may recall the article said "Philosophies we may seek, but whether such need be framed in terms of Heaven or Hell, Christ or Satan, is certainly a matter worth doubting." Without question man must have a philosophy. In that realm, he may formulate principles such as charity, restraint, forgiveness, honesty and the like. These may well be formulas for a manageable civilization, but they needn't be dictates from heaven. Lacking sound scientific proof as to the existence of a God, I cannot resist the conclusion that these formulas are merely man made.

Howard Smith

Post medieval truth or grapevine knowledge?

Dear Editor:

I write in response to Howard Smith's article "God isn't dead - he never lived" (Journal, Oct 22-76).

First, let me clarify one point. Although I do hold the position of president of Queen's Christian Fellowship, it is not from this position that I write. The following thoughts, therefore, represent my personal convictions.

Howard is correct. God isn't dead. He is wrong, however, when he says "he never lived" (He (God) not only lived, He lives).

Howard's first sentence seems to be a modern translation of the marxist proposal that "religion is the opiate of the masses". I will assume,

Ed. ignored

Dear Editor,

Would you believe three times lucky? For the second year in a row the A.M.S. has once again (conveniently) ignored the existence of almost nine hundred Faculty of Education students. Refunds for the A.M.S. Concert Series and/or Tricolour were scheduled for October 22, 25, or 26, a period during which McArthur students were away practice teaching from the tone of the article, that this was not his intention, but rather that the article represents his own thoughts.

If, as is possible, Howard has developed these attitudes as a result of his contact with a "dead Church", I would like to suggest that he search for a "living Church". There are some around.

If, on the other hand, Howard acquired his knowledge of the Church through the grape-vine, let me challenge him to find out the "truth" about the Church for himself. After all, all post-medieval minds are interested in the "truth", aren't they?

Don Blair

(the teaching round extended from October 18 to the 29th). If the A.M.S. is so hard pressed for finances (a saving of $9.00 times approximately 900 students generates a little more than $8,000.00 income) perhaps they should consider running the refund ad as a one liner in the classifieds during Toronto weekend next year. (Please spare the comment that this year's ad was a full page; a full page, or an entire newspaper full of ads is of little help to students who are not on campus to read the paper let alone collect their money.)

I sincerely hope that this deplorable oversight (ignorance perhaps) will be rectified and three days will be scheduled for education students, while they are on campus, to pick up their Tricolour and/or Concert refund.

Sincerely,
Nada Beamish

Erratum

Last Friday's letter from Mrs. Pat Douglas-Murray inadvertently left out her position as Chairperson of the Queen's Residence Board.

What about the Jews?

Dear Editor:

Gord Taylor's answer to Howard Smith's assertion that the Church's role in modern society is superfluous is even more repugnant than Howard's original position. Instead of challenging Howard on his own ground Taylor, the A.M.S. rep for the Theological Society, chose to evade the issue and argue that the Church doesn't care about 'good works' but only faith in Jesus Christ. Carried to its ultimate end, the idea that faith in Jesus is the only precondition for salvation would admit to heaven Adolf Eichmann, provided he had faith, while the millions of Jews whose deaths he masterminded are condemned to purgatory because they didn't accept Jesus.

There is something basically wrong with a theology which is so insecure with its own inherent value that it must define itself in a manner which denies to all other faiths and particularly to Judaism (the shackles of legalism which were strangling God's revelation to the Hebrews) any religious value.

It is this doctrine of exclusivity which taints the beautiful concept of Christian love. History is scarred with the corpses of religions and their followers who were persecuted when they failed to join the fold and acknowledge Christianity as the only truth.

Surely the primary practical purpose of religion is to provide a conscience for the world and moral guidelines for individual conduct. By this standard, any religion which employs its own particularisms to fulfill this purpose for its followers can be a true religion without the need to deny the legitimacy of other faiths.

Murray Hart

Transkei less than free

Dear Editor,

The enlightened simpleton who wrote the global newsbrief on the 'independence' - of the Transkei in last Friday's Journal displayed not only an unqualified lack of intelligence, but rather a lack of understanding of the concept of freedom itself. Unfortunately, I am helpless in assisting this person in overcoming his or her I.Q. deficiencies, however concerning the second charge I may be of some help, as I'm sure would the 21 million blacks who live in South Africa. In brief, freedom as a state of being necessitates the absence of coercion or constraint in choice or in action, in other words, possessing the power or condition of acting without compulsion. To this end I'm sure you would agree that the indigenous peoples that occupy the Transkei homeland are far from attaining this ideal. Pomp and circumstance are not yardsticks by which to measure independence.

Sincerely,
George Benson

Names of politically active profs passed to Dean's office:

Explanations assurances needed

by Ross Sutherland

It may be fallacious to assume the worst. It is dangerous to let a fundamentally wrong act go unchallenged!

On Oct. 15th three departments were asked for information concerning which professors had cancelled or rescheduled classes on Oct. 14th. Why? According to the Lictor, Oct. 28, 1976, "Dean Sinclair...feels a responsibility to those students who do not choose to participate in such a venture (walking out) and must therefore ensure that these students...receive the proper instruction in courses". Said in the true bureaucratic spirit, completely above morality and the cruel world of social reality. Nevertheless his motives were probably noble. Similarly Brabeuf thought he was helping the North American Natives. Vorster thinks he is helping the Blacks. Obviously to judge an action, it's implications, not it's intentions, must be understood.

The major implication of Dean Sinclair's, or Principle Watt's, or whoever's action (there is considerable haziness surrounding the details of this 'innocent' act) is that someone in a position of power ends up with the names of professors who engaged in a certain political action. Significantly a political action that did not have general campus approval. Some of these names have been collected. Sociology, for example, passed names into the Deans office. Subsequently that department's faculty passed a motion condemning the initial inquiry. Dean Sinclair, we need a public response to this charge of abrogating academic norms.

A key principle among academic norms is academic freedom. If this principle is to have any meaning it has to include the freedom of public expression and action, e.g. a solution never stated can't solve anything. The best way to state the solution is a matter of conscience, of discussion, and of experience. To deny this (which this action in small way does) is to jeopardize the role of the university.

Dean Sinclair is quoted as saying that due to present contract agreements no punitive action can be taken. O.K. for the present but what about when contracts come up for renewal, or merit pay is being decided. A little reminder of who were the 'disruptive' profs might be useful in finally making them pay for their 'undesirable' political behaviour.

Three things are immediately needed: 1) a complete and consistent explanation of what exactly happened 2) assurances that any record of names collected are destroyed 3) assurances that no similar activity will take place in the future.

Hopefully the whole affair is an innocent miscalculation. Either way, the sooner it is cleared up the better for everyone.

Pride in your Plants

by Rod Pryde

Houseplants, being as they are a growing passion among students, cry out for a few words as to their proper care—care in buying, for example.

Where one purchases his houseplants is very important. The store should be clean and bright, have a wide variety of plants available, and also a wide choice among plants of the same species. Healthy plants aren't crowded or sitting in water—one should inspect the plant he wishes to purchase, making certain it appears healthy. Even, bushy appearance, no protruding roots, and lack of trimmed leaves, brown edges on the leaves, or signs of insects or diseases are vital criteria. Most important are store personnel who know and care about plants.

After choosing a plant, ask a salesperson its scientific name and cultural requirements should you not know them. You might check this information in a plant book to make sure it is correct. It is good to enquire as well if you can return the plant should it die through no fault of your own.

When you get your plant home, check to see if it is pot bound, improperly crocked, or lacking the proper type of soil. If any of these conditions exist, remedy them immediately. Check the roots to see if they show any signs of rot and if so return the plant.

If your plant has not been acclimatized to houses it may wither even if it receives proper care. If this happens, place the plant in a temporary terrarium made from a sealed, inflated clear plastic bag, ensuring that the plant isn't touching the bag. Place a dish of water in the bag to increase the humidity. When the plant is once again turgid, remove it from the bag, but return it to the bag at the first sign of further withering. If it never regains its turgor it is probably diseased and should by all means be returned to the store.

Are we insane?

by Michael Hermiston [idealist]

A major report has been released from a well known Ontario University, that the majority, a whopping 90 percent of its students can be classified as insane. The report is a culmination of the extensive research and experimentation conducted by two visiting professors. (Dr. R. Rasko, University of St. Petersburg and Dr. L. Nikov, University of Moscow, who were both exiled from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic for honesty against the state.)

Their findings show an unusually high degree of conformism amongst the students. The apparent lack of concern for the future has resulted in another generation of oil burners, alcoholics, materialists, sex offenders, nuclear power advocates, self-centred, nutrition-void humans. The report attributes these characteristics to the excellent behavioristic practices of parents.

Students asked to comment on the results mentioned that they thought sex offenses were down and that their cars were tuned to peak efficiency to conserve gas. Furthermore, they didn't much care to concern themselves with such an obviously biased report coming from "them old guys".

Professors however, quickly supported the students, saying that the degree of concern for environment preservation and energy conservation has risen sharply and that the world is in for a tremendous uplift as the result of a "concerned and competent generation".

Drs. Rasko and Nikov stated most emphatically that they were illabergasted with their findings. They both intend to return immediately to the USSR, if only to be imprisoned in Siberia, to escape the destined disaster which shall befall Canada when this generation comes into power.

Bystanders to Life

The following editorial recently appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail:

At Crescent Valley in the West Kootenay region of British Columbia a dozen people stood around watching for 45 minutes while an injured man lay dying in the cold mountain water of Goose Creek. Some of them made a move towards helping him but were stopped by the others. He was still alive when an RCMP constable pulled him out and gave him mouth to mouth resuscitation. But he died on the way to the hospital. A pathologist said it was the long exposure to the cold water that killed him. Police said the bystanders were of various ages and seemed ordinary, average people.

We have heard too often of robberies, rapes and murders taking place under the eyes of large numbers of spectators, none of whom made a move to interfere. And we have attributed this inaction to fear of physical injury, to fear of what "becoming involved" could lead to, or to the alienation and callousness that are widely held to be products of life in big cities. We have heard of crowds that baited a hesitant suicide to jump or to slash his wrists, scenes of horror that phrases like "man's inhumanity to man" may describe but do not explain.

But this case is different. Crescent Valley, 16 miles northeast of Castlegar, is not the impersonal heart of some big city where live and let live turned inside out becomes die and let die. No physical courage would have been required to pull the victim out of the creek. The bystanders do not appear to have been callous people. They helped another man who had been hurt in the same car accident but who remained conscious and escaped being thrown in the water.

Then why the failure of common sense?

For all of us who were not there the urge is strong to believe that there was something very strange about those 12 bystanders and that, had we been there, it would have been quite another story. Yet they seemed ordinary people to the police, apart from actually having to be ordered to give any help, and as the RCMP constable said, "Ordinary people around here are pretty good." It is hard to seal out completely a small, gnawing doubt that we are any less strange than they, a suspicion that they really were 12 of our peers. And, in that case, how did we get that way?

It might be worth exploring the hypothesis that they were inhibited by what they remembered as expert advice - not to move an accident victim until medical help arrives for fear of doing him further injury and possibly leaving themselves open to legal action. We have all for decades now been living under a bombardment of expertise, most of it telling us in one way or another that we must never trust the common sense and the instincts that arise from our inexpert, untutored humanity. Generations of child-care experts, while feeding among themselves, have battered generations of parents out of the quaint notion that love and basic human respect are any adequate guides to child-rearing. In other spheres we get tutored by psychologists, pedagogues, social workers, people who knock down houses and put the poor people into barracks for their own good, airport planners, motivational researchers, economists, sociologists, communicators, futurists.

Are we all running around, like Mary Hartman, with heads so stuffed with lunatic rags and tags of remembered expertise that when we have to call on simple common sense we find it paralyzed?

Have we learned out so many of our responsibilities as human beings to governments, agencies, bureaucracies, consultants, that we have become spectators of our own lives?

NDP Column by George Gregory

Ever since I became aware of political realities, I have felt strong sympathy for the NDP. This year I decided to do something about those feelings and so I joined the Queen's NDP. To me this seemed like a very logical thing to do and something that anyone who knew me would understand. Yet now that I have started wearing my NDP button occasionally and mentioning that I am a New Democrat, friends and acquaintances of mine seem surprised or even shocked.

When I start to explain the reasons for my political feelings some people just turn and walk away, largely because they feel that the NDP is the party that is trying to keep them from earning their million dollars before they are thirty years old. Others who have some decent amount of human warmth, and who do not look at the world from a position of complete self-interest, still fail to understand why I support the NDP. To them, anyone who is a member of that party is a dupe (although perhaps a well-meaning one) of the unions who are driving this country into bankruptcy.

I have long since given up trying to deal rationally with the members of the first group; they are beyond redemption. It is to the second group that I address myself.

The difficulty with capitalism, as I see it, is that serious injustice is necessarily a part of the system. This is so because the basis of capitalism is competition, which implies that there must be "winners" and "losers." In the capitalist system, the winners are those who get good jobs with very high wages. It should be obvious that for every winner in our society there must be lots of losers. In fact, one-fifth of Canada's population loses badly, that is to say that they are statistically poor. In 1969, the poverty line for the average family was between $2500 and $3000. As a student, you probably spend about $2200 during the school year on living, quite apart from tuition, books and expenses necessitated by university; this would work out to about $3300 for the year if you didn't go home for the summer. Obviously, inflation has taken its toll and the $3300 you could spend in the year is worth less than the $2300 to $3000 the one out of five Canadian families had to spend in 1969. Still, the situation of the poor should be brought home to you. Say you had an extra $1500 to make your situation comparable to the standard of wealth of poor families in 1969. Imagine trying to support a WHOLE FAMILY on the amount of money you have to spend plus half as much again, remembering that you don't have any subsidized sports facilities, movies or cheap dances as entertainment.

Imagine, too, that rather than being a member of a friendly fraternity of students, you are living in a cold, unfriendly city. To be a capitalist, you must be prepared to accept that one-fifth of your population must live in this fashion. You must say that you approve of whole families living on little more than one "poor" student lives. What's more, you must be prepared to do this when there is an alternative.

The alternative, of course, is socialism. Its basic tenet states that capitalist-style competition should be abolished, and with it unnecessary poverty should be eliminated. Poverty in Canada is unnecessary. The Gross National Product per capita in Canada in 1969 was over $6000, that means that every person in Canada could have had $6000. Some people are getting more than their fair share.

Liberal Column by Sheilagh Dunn

The provincial election in Quebec was called to reinforce Premier Bourassa's stand when the constitutional patriation issue rears its head again. The Liberal government must also consolidate its position on Bill 22. There has been growing vocal opposition to bilingualism in Canada lately, especially from unexpected sources such as James Richardson.

Basically, M. Bourassa is pushing for equality within the Canadian federal structure and guarantees of Quebec provincial control over French language and culture. He is pressing these demands to show the people of Quebec that they have an alternative to the Parti Quebecois in terms of French survival. The Liberals must protect the French language and culture enough to satisfy the populace and prevent any mass support of the PQ. Both parties want Quebec as mistress of her own affairs but their methods differ. The Liberals are committed to the federal system; the PQ wants a popular referendum on the issue of independence.

The PQ has a substantial chunk of the popular vote in Quebec but because of the electoral system, this support is not translated into seats in the National Assembly. Rene Levesque is fighting to hold onto his leadership. The most fiery and appealing leader in Quebec, he cannot lead the attack against the government without a seat.

The Liberals have been able to attract three big names on the federal scene to run in this election. Jean Marchand and Bryce Mackasey, both former cabinet members and Andre Raynaud, former chairman of the Economic Council of Canada are running as Liberals. Perhaps Premier Bourassa is seeking respectable and reputable candidates who can win the votes of English-speaking Quebecers angered by Bill 22.

The Anglophone population feels degraded by the legislation which establishes French as Quebec's primary language. Cries of "second class citizens" are common. Such disenchantment has led to the formation of a protest party aiming at the English-speaking voters in the Montreal area. The Democratic Alliance is seeking the votes formerly accorded to the Liberals.

The Union Nationale (the Quebec Conservative Party) and Social Credit are no longer the powerful parties they once were in Quebec politics. Both parties had strong rural bases and represented the needs and demands of the large agricultural population. Now, however, Quebec's problems are increasingly urban - unemployment, labour disputes, economic policy. The growing nationalist sentiment in Quebec overshadows the sectional concerns of the farmers. The Social Credit in Quebec appears stronger than its popular vote warrants. Their support is concentrated in several rural areas which takes advantage of the electoral system. The Parti Quebecois voters are too diffuse to enjoy this advantage.

The new, small parties such as the Democratic Alliance and Jerome Choquette's Popular National Party will help split the vote and probably cut into the substantial Liberal majority. Such parties illustrate disaffection with the traditional Liberals and an inability to support the Parti Quebecois at this time. Experts are predicting a Liberal win but not the landslide of 1973.

So, expect a strong stand from the Quebec government in the forthcoming constitutional talks, re-establishing Quebec as the crusader for more provincial autonomy in communications, cultural affairs, and language and cultural protection.

PC Column by Rob Welch

In last week's column, this admittedly (and unashamedly) partisan observer said that the legislative "package" put before the Ontario Parliament by the provincial Progressive Conservative Government would have to be a good one, in order for the Tories to entertain any thoughts of winning the next election. In a minority situation, a government sometimes must walk a tightrope between leadership and political expediency. This can weaken legislation. The Ontario Government's legislative proposals, while not reckless as, as Robert Williamson of the Globe and Mail put it, "bold".

Some measures seem somewhat unimportant. The government intends to reduce red tape for small businesses by amending certain laws. It is hoped that the "paper ridden" relationship between these enterprises and government can be simplified. This proposal, however, does inform the Tories' commitment to helping small businesses. Other anticipated legislative pieces are very important for Ontarians, and perhaps could be considered a bit overdue. Safety rules in mines and industrial worksites will be tightened up. Indeed, some workers, particularly miners, will be able to legally walk off their jobs if they judge a jobsite to be unsafe to work at. As a response to certain concerns regarding police brutality, a citizens' complaint bureau and a special tribunal to hear complaints against police will be created; after legislation to this effect is passed.

Last June, a farm income stabilization bill introduced by the Tories was defeated in the House. A new Farm Bill, if passed, will protect the incomes of farmers who grow all marketed agricultural products. Farmers will be guaranteed about 90 percent of the average price of their products in the previous five years, in this voluntary plan. The government will provide two-thirds of the coverage while the farmers, if they wish to be covered, will be asked to provide the rest.

Farmers will also be given strong representation on the board administering the program. Opposition amendments to this bill are expected, and some might be incorporated into the legislation. The new bill, however, should pass.

Finally, in one of the most significant pieces of social legislation introduced in this province in a long time, the government has proposed changes in family law which, among other things, give both marriage partners an equal share in such assets as the family home, and view couples who have lived together for at least two years as legally married. A standing committee will study the bill and hear public briefs before the bill becomes law, perhaps recommending some changes in the measure.

This is a full legislative program. It comes from a government which has responded to the wishes of Ontarians, and which has accepted some valuable suggestions from opposition parties, particularly the New Democrats. Ultimately, though, this legislative program comes from a government which has exhibited some sound leadership. Ontario will benefit as a result of this.

Decisions - parole board bites bullet

The parole Act originally was designed during the time when there were few concerns being expressed about the rights of inmates. There was little legislation. There were certainly few appeals to court. A person before the court was given safeguards prior to conviction but at the time of conviction it was inferred that he lost his rights. As a result, when the parole Act was put together, the act gave unfettered discretion to the Parole Board to release people or not to release them. There was no provision built in to the law that the inmate had a right to a hearing; there was no provision put in that he would have a right to reasons. He applied and was told eventually, "yes" or "no". In our law today an inmate has only three rights as far as parole is concerned. The first one is that, within six months of his sentence, he will be told the date on which he is eligible to be considered for parole. When that date arrives, he has a right to be told whether or not he will be granted a parole. And, thirdly, if he is granted a parole by the board, he is not able to be taken off the street and put into prison unless there is a valid warrant issued against him. No other rights are provided in the law.

It is my feeling and the feeling of an increased number of people on the Board and the general public, that, by virtue of persons going to prison, they should not lose their rights. At the UN Congress, one of the statements Canada supported was that an inmate should not lose any more rights than absolutely necessary to make sure he was contained in the institution. If you accept that principle, then you move very quickly beyond the limited level of rights an inmate has at present to provision of many more. We've been aware of this for a long time and that it is undesirable.

Within our administrative policy, we have, since 1970, provided hearings for inmates throughout federal institutions which go well beyond the limits required by law. We have given them reasons orally, again well beyond requirements of the law. In April, 1974, we initiated a program that when a warrant of suspension is issued against a parolee or person on mandatory supervision, he must be seen by a parole officer within ten days of apprehension, and the reasons for suspension must be explained to him. These are procedural safeguards we are now providing because we feel they are right and fair.

There is need to enshrine these procedural safeguards into law. If I were to say, right now, there will be no more parole hearings in the institution, I could just say it and they would not be reinstituted. That kind of authority should not reside in a bureaucrat. The move is to try to provide opportunity in the law in the regulations of the Act so they will have to be done, because, in our feeling, they are consistent with what the administration of justice in Canada should provide.

William R. Outerbridge
Chairman National Parole Board

There is a tremendous amount of misunderstanding about parole. Somehow the perception is that a group of people sit here, without limits to their power, who arbitrarily decide by a flip of a coin or what their digestive system says as to whether or not a person should go out. Many of the so-called successes that happen as a result of parole are not things we talk about. The person who is out, who is successful, doesn't want to be exposed.

There is another perception: that this becomes a rather simple yes or no answer, with little understanding of the research that goes into the study of each case before the Board makes a decision. Much less than half the inmates who apply are granted parole by the board. The documentation we have before we interview an inmate in the federal institution takes four or five months to prepare. It's a considerable document with a good deal of background information from the police, the courts that sentenced the man, from his previous records, from his previous employment history that comes from a presentenced report, his institutional behaviour, the plans he has for his release, any psychiatric or psychological reports provided, all this serves as the background information. It's on the basis of these written reports and the interview that the decision is reached. Right now, about 35 or 40 percent of those who apply for parole from the federal institutions are granted it.

Among 35 or 40 per cent, there are inevitably some persons about whom we don't know enough to make a decision, or many others about whom we know a great deal but we can not anticipate future behaviour. As an example, we may find a person who has very little violence in his record, who is released on parole and goes out to find his wife has been involved with someone else, and this may result in a violent offence, inconsistent with his pattern of behaviour. Also, there are persons who have had patterns of behaviour who have consistently, within the institution, attempted to bring them under control, and we may find that we release them on parole and nothing happens. So it is ultimately a very difficult kind of judgment call. When you are looking for a quick scapegoat for things that go wrong, it's very easy to point a finger at parole. Rather than expecting lifetime immunity from further crime from parole, the expectation should be whether or not those who are on the Board are using this responsibility in their judgment calls with as much care as possible.

When I was a member of the Board going through institutions and talking to people, we would give verbally to the inmate the reasons for which parole was being denied. There are many times when I have said to inmates, "Look, ultimately this is a judgment call. We are denying you parole for this and this reason, your past, and there is no way I can say I am absolutely right but I am the person responsible for this decision and I must make it the way I feel I must. And so if I am wrong, I can only apologize to you. That's the way it's going to be, and this is one of the kinds of bullets parole officers have to bite."

We operate under a law that requires us to make decisions which have to do with the freedom of people. In making those decisions there is obviously the need to look to how our decisions may help the inmate who has applied for parole. But there's a more important decision to try and ensure, as best we can, that an inmate will not create a greater threat to community. So we have two balancing components and, of the two, there is no question about the protection of society being the more important one, and that is one of the reasons we study cases with the care we do. It is one of the reasons we parole a relatively small percentage of those who apply.

Lithography lecture

Michael Twyman to speak on 1820's

Dr. Michael Twyman of the University of Reading in England, will give a lecture on the lithography of the 1820's on November 8th, 8.30 p.m. in Stirling Hall.

The 1820's were the formative years for the development of successful methods of drawing on stone in France and England. The treatises of Godefroy Engelmann (Paris, 1822) and Charles Hullmandel (London, 1824) were influential in promoting the process and in particular establishing it as a respectable and reliable method of making prints. In celebration of the current exhibition, French Lithography: The Restoration Salons 1817-1824, the Agnes Etherington Art Centre is pleased to present Dr. Twyman's lecture on this period that accounts for some of the best professionally drawn lithographs as well as some of the most powerful artists' lithographs ever produced.

Dr. Twyman will discuss the forementioned treatises as a basis for considering how artists would have drawn on stone in the 1820's. He will describe the different methods they recommended and consider the extent to which they were actually practised by lithographers of the time. The talk will be copiously illustrated.

Currently a professor of typography and graphic communication, Dr. Twyman's responsibilities include presiding over a subcommittee of the Association Typographique Internationale, chairing the Working Party on Typographic Teaching as well as active membership on several design and historical societies. He has published numerous books and major articles on the subject of lithography and related graphic arts since 1965.

Miriam Waddington

A skilled reading

by Bart Binder

Canadian poetess Miriam Waddington came to Queen's last Thursday night, and gave a reading that displayed the range and control she has developed over thirty-odd years of writing.

Ms. Waddington quickly overcame the awkward atmosphere of a half-filled Kingston Hall Red Room with a relaxed patter between poems. She concentrated largely on the older work contained in her 1972 book Driving Home [Poems New and Selected], reading only a couple of pieces from her new volume The Price of Gold. The poems she read encompassed quite a variety of topics, bilingualism, fame, dreams, the urban landscape and an ironic - even bitter - look at new trends in Canadian poetry.

I must learn to write & for and
and will for will to put; at the beginning of a line
instead of at the end

Ms. Waddington seems most comfortable when writing in a loose balladic form. Many of her strongest poems employ to advantage the lilting rhythmic movement such a frame provides. The reading concluded with a brief question period, during which Ms. Waddington noted that unlike some poets, she finds it impossible to revise poems years after their publication, as the original mood and ambience are irretrievable. The poems read Thursday night are likely the finest that will be heard at Queen's for some time.

"I don't think one ever ought to be satisfied."

An interview with Al Purdy

by Grant Heckman

Al Purdy lives in an "A" frame house of his own construction in Ameliasburg, Ontario. He is the recipient of the 1966 Governor-General's Award for his book "THE CARIBOOHOUSE" and has been writer in residence at Loyola and the University of Manitoba. In the more than twenty books of verse he has published since 1944, Purdy has developed a trenchant though disarmingly informal poetic voice rooted in the land and lifestyles of rural Ontario. His most recent collection, "SUNDANCE AT DUSK" is scheduled for release in early November. Al Purdy's house is full of books and White Owl cigars. It is hidden behind a line of dry cedars on the edge of Roblin Lake. We talked before his fireplace on a bitter October afternoon, and when I had run out of questions, we consulted a liquid muse. Looking out across the water, I could see the silver steeple of the poem "Wilderness Gothic." At intervals a well-chewed sogie would fly into the fire with a sizzle. This conversation emerged.

Journal: How many poems do you begin a week?

Purdy: Sometimes I begin none. At one time or another I've written as many as ten a week, but I don't write as many now. I just came back from the Soviet Union, and in two weeks there I wrote eleven. I've got a little book of them which I'm going to call Moss on the Iron Curtain. I'm writing an article for a magazine that I hope to use also as the introduction to this book of Russian poems.

Journal: You mention in several poems that words are not enough to properly render experience, but that they are also all that we have. Isn't it possible that words, properly arranged, might partake of the same sort of magic as the original event, and thereby be in some way of the same nature?

Purdy: I suppose one of the things you try to do with poetry, at least some of the time, is create the emotion and feeling of the original event and forget the words entirely, and the fact that it's being produced by words - but that doesn't happen very often.

Journal: Many of your poems are self-conscious in that they refer to themselves at various points. Does this have something to do with inadequacy of language as you perceive it?

Purdy: I doubt it. In the first place, I don't see how a writer, and particularly a poet, who is writing about his own life a lot of the time, can help being self-conscious. Novelists are too, of course, but they're not writing so directly out of their own life. I don't think. Maybe some poets try to avoid the appearance of self-consciousness. I don't. When I say self-conscious, I don't mean embarrassment; I'm just aware of what I'm doing. There are, of course, occasions when you lose yourself, and forget all about that.

Journal: Perhaps the most common feature of your work is the extension of a particular event into the general realm. All writers do this, of course, but you seem to accomplish it with greater felicity and in a wider variety of ways than anyone else I know of. Do these associations of a specific event with a mythological or otherwise more universal connotation occur to you instantly, or are they evolved through later reflection and writing?

Purdy: If they occurred to you right away, you'd have the ending and the beginning of your poem written, which never happens. Only the worst writers could know the ending right away, and I doubt if even they do. A poem unravels out of your mind; largely out of the subconscious. The awareness unites with the subconscious, I suppose, and you can't know what the result will be.

Journal: Fred Cogswell describes this type of wide-ranging association in your work "the power to fuse seemingly unfusable elements." It would seem to me that easily fusible elements are clichés, and therefore it is the difficult ones that are the real province of poetry.

Purdy: Certainly some writer's minds fly off at wider tangents than others. For instance, I wrote a review last night of Ron Everson, who has a mind like a carpet sweeper; all the information he's ever picked up from books seemingly is lodged in his mind still. One of his earlier poems was about picking up wood for a campfire, seeing the thing blaze, and then thinking of the blaze of Athens in its brief period, Lincoln's mind when he changed it, and a couple of other things - all in one little poem. These are pretty disparate things but, nevertheless, through the sheer ability to say a thing well he made you feel it.

Journal: What is your religious stance?

Purdy: You make your own life meaningful or not, as the case may be. You find your own meaning, and you must, because it's rather doubtful that there's any abstract meaning. In other words, I consider it very doubtful that there is a diety

Journal: Can you generally tell when reading a new poet whether or not he is an academic or self-taught like yourself?

Purdy: You can get a pretty good idea of what a poet's background is by looking at their work in some quantity. You can generally tell an academic poet, that's true. I think I was a pretty academic sounding poet at one time.

Journal: You mean "The Enchanted Echo?"

Purdy: No not that one. I'm thinking of "Emu Remember" and a couple of early chapbooks. I was writing the way I thought poems should be written, rather than the way I felt about them.

Journal: Do you think an academic poet would be less likely to adopt the oral style which you have evolved?

Purdy: (Laughs) Have I evolved an oral style? What about Birney? Birney is in many ways an academic poet; he's taught all his life, he has a very wide knowledge - a far wider knowledge than I'll ever have. What about Layton? Has he got an academic style?

Journal: Well, not academic, perhaps, but less conversational than yours.

Purdy: He's rigidly traditional, it seems to me. He's much more

There's a credo among some poets that you've got to write off the top of your head, just let it flow--which is a pile of shit.

didactic and dogmatic. The teacher comes through; he wants to tell people things, pound it into their heads. Birney's less that.

Journal: I think some new poets are getting in over their heads, so to speak, by writing in a very loose and prosy style without first working through their literary heritage, and as a result, some very bad work is being published.

Purdy: This is very true. There are all sorts of reasons for it. For instance, there is a credo among some poets that you've got to write off the top of your head, just let it flow, which is a lot of shit. That's the Jack Kerouac style, and the Black Mountain, too. Some of them might deny it, but it's true nevertheless. Another reason for all the bad stuff being published these days is that writers have never been so fortunate in this country, what with the C.B.C. and the Canada Council. If you've got any ability at all, you're liable to get published. Back in the early fifties, there were no outlets, and there was no money. Another reason is the upsurge of nationalism, we don't immediately dismiss a thing because it's written by a Canadian, which used to happen. Novelists and filmmakers can go to other countries and live, but poets cannot. They just can't do it. Cohen is the only possible exception.

Journal: It wasn't really his poetry, though, that gave him his international stature.

Purdy: (Laughs) No it was his crummy voice. It's an interesting point, though, that poets can't move to other countries. There are exceptions, like Eliot and Auden, but to transplant your entire experience to another country - it may be quite meaningful - have universal qualities in your own country - but it loses everything when you leave it.

Journal: You've had a fairly close acquaintance with new writing through the two "Storm Warning" books. Are you optimistic about the newest generation of Canadian poets?

Purdy: I don't know. I think the second book "Storm Warning II" is far better than the first, despite the fact that several of the poets in the first book became better known, but that doesn't indicate that the people in it are really going to achieve anything. There's Rosemary Aubert, whom I think is very good, and Tom Howe. Erin Moure is a very fine poet. I think I'd give her as good a chance as any I'm highly interested in these younger poets, because the older ones map themselves out on the page, and restrict themselves somehow. You know that they're not going to surprise you very much. They have characterized themselves.

Journal: Do you think anything of enduring interest has emerged or will emerge from the concrete poetry experiment?

Purdy: I don't pay much attention to it. I'm tempted to regard it as another novelty, and novelties die out. The 'found poetry' idea, though, which is I guess a branch of the concrete - another novelty - seems to me an intriguing game to play with other people's prose.

Journal: There are whole books of that now, aren't there - by John Robert Colombo, for one.

Purdy: When I was in Russia, I found that Colombo had been there before me. Voznesensky, the Russian poet, stayed at Colombo's place in Canada, and then invited him back to Russia. Voznesensky I'd regard as just about the top poet in the world. Anyway, we were at the Russian Writer's Union and Lala, who's the wife of one of the official writers says to me, without any warning whatsoever, "Colombo's a better poet than you, Purdy. He wrote a poem about me." So I wrote a poem called "Colombo Was Here," along the lines of "Kilroy Was Here."

Journal: Are you conscious of any formulable change in the direction of Canadian writing?

Purdy: The poets now are much more sophisticated. They're not so prone to metrics as they used to be. About 90 percent of the women poets that sent stuff for Storm Warning wrote about love, and of the men, about 60 percent of them wrote about love, so you know, "What makes the world go 'round." I suppose it's natural at a particular age, and so on.

Journal: You mentioned in an interview with Gary Geddes, that you found "a particular voice", beginning with "Poems for All the Annettes." Do you think that you are still writing in this same voice?

Purdy: No. There has been some sort of evolution. (Maybe a poem like "Colombo Was Here" would be more recognizable in relation to those earlier poems.) I was trying all sorts of experiments on the page, the breaking of lines, and the way I used words, and I certainly don't do that now in the same way. I am probably grown much more conservative with age. I had been rigid and hide-bound, academic sounding, as I mentioned before, and I broke out of that, partly by a conscious effort to do so, and when I broke out of it I went in all sorts of directions at once. I'm not trying to do that any more. I'm not trying to break out of anything. Even though one may find what one thinks is the best way to speak, one is always looking for different ways just the same, with one part of the mind. I don't think one ever ought to be satisfied. You may be more or less satisfied with a single poem, although you're liable to change your mind about that too, in a week.

At the Domino

You may see yourself or your friends at Hard Maple

by Donald Rayko

Hard Maple is an important play. Not because it has the kind of literary merit that will make it required reading in Canlit courses from now until the bicentennial. Not because it was given the quintessential interpretation and production at its world premiere on the Domino stage last week. Hardly.

Hard Maple is important to Kingston and to the Domino Theatre because it is a sign of the willingness of the Domino Theatre to take seriously a responsibility to Kingston. And that is the responsibility of a theatre to interpret a community to itself, to serve as a filter and lens, focussing the community's attention onto itself—for contemplation, celebration and consideration of changes. No number of imported farces or mysteries or TV sitcoms transplanted onto the stage can do that. But something like Hard Maple can. The large opening night crowd attests to that.

Written by a Kingstonian, Bill Harding, and directed by Ruth Barton, the play began its three week run last Thursday. Set in Sydenham Ward, it revolves around a feisty quartet of elderly men and their efforts to deal with a society that relegates them from the category of the living to that of the merely pre-deceased, at the age of sixty-five. It is a paean to independence, employment, friendship and human dignity—over the hill, and even before Bill Harding's aspirations were noble in writing the play, and the Domino's noble in mounting the production. In a meaningful sense, Hard Maple is a good play, regardless of its execution.

Sad to say, the play itself is very weak. The action moves in fits and starts, in the first act, not at all; in the second act some, but it is not much helped by a permanent personality reformation in one of the protagonist's daughters, from a condescending anti-life bitch to a gelatinous mass of love, contrition, and peace with the world in the space of sixty seconds (—that's the length of a soap commercial!), and the third act bears only the most tenuous of connections to the previous two, it seems to have been appended for no other purposes than to contrive a suspiciously deus ex machina happy ending, and to bring the play up to length.

The cast is rather large, but many characters flit in, deliver a few inconsequential lines, clutter up the stage for a while, and then flit out, having served no apparent dramatic purpose. Structurally, the play is rather messy.

There are comic bright spots, however. Horace, the archetypal lovable dirty old man is asked, "What's your secret?" and he replies, with perfect candor, "Clean livin'—give it up when I was fourteen, and never looked back." The man is a legend in his own time.

The quality of performances ranged from comic gems by Jim East in the role of Horace and by Mary Barclay in the small but deliciously done part of his girlfriend, Birdie, to a vigorously disastrous effort by David Tompkins in the part of a martinet geriatrics ward attendant. You have to really work to be that good, or that bad. The rest of the cast was generally unremarkable and unmemorable. There was one thing, however, that stuck out while characters ranged in age from sixteen to eighty-three, and the apparent ages of the players from fourteen to sixty-five, there was a disturbingly little correlation between the two. Miscasting, poor make-up and mediocre acting won out over the attempted suspension of disbelief.

I do not wish to be too harsh with playwright, director or cast. I think they have done a valuable thing. I look forward to the Domino's next local play—by Bill Harding, or by anyone else. And even with its flaws, I recommend Hard Maple to you. If you don't run into yourself there, you're sure to see one of your neighbours.

David Essig at the Scarecrow

Guitar too fancy but Essig still great

by Davis Eagle

I recently came to a rather startling realization, to wit not everyone likes the same things that I do. Pretty staggering eh? Well trivial as that may sound, it certainly seems to clear up a number of apparent difficulties I've been having lately, like, why was everybody so knocked out with David Essig's guitar playing last weekend at Scarecrow? Essig has a number of things working in his favour, and deserves full credit for them, but you don't have to be Joe-music-critic to recognize the inadequacy of his instrumental presentation. What I mean to say is that he was sloppy. Essig plays a predominantly flat-picked Bluegrass style, has superfast hands and a reasonably well defined melodic sense, but tends to let his speed and invention take over. The result is a loss of clarity and tone. This I find to be the failing of most guitar players of his ilk; what I found objectionable about Essig was the manner in which he sloughed off licks so that he got a lot of finger action but no sound. Regardless of this major problem the crowd loved it. Quite frankly I was surprised.

All that aside, I thought Essig put on a very good show. I found his manner both engaging and relaxing as did the audience who responded by joining in on a number of sing-alongs. The highlight was the title song of his third album Stewart Crossing. On both the evenings I saw him, he displayed remarkable energy for someone who has been on the road for the last couple of months. The exuberance he showed was contagious as was his sense of humour which he let fly with a good understanding of appropriateness as in his parody of John Denver's Thank God I'm A Country Boy called Thank God I'm A Doctor's Wife.

Essig has written a great deal of excellent material, but the best of it suffered from his voice which is perfect for tunes like Mexico Suite, but lacks the control for ones such as "Like a Daughter To Me". All in all he put on a very enjoyable show and as I said before deserved the applause and admiration of the crowd, except for his instrumentals. When will people realize that guitar players are a dime a dozen and in order to truly excell you've got to have more going for you than flashy licks. It is my feeling that undue approbation of the "gunpowder guitar" syndrome breeds mediocrity, an attitude which I think is best left to the W.H.A.

Records

by Bob Murphy

A better name for this album might be Remake-Remodel. "Let's Stick Together", Bryan Ferry's third solo album, reaffirms his penchant for bizarre recastings of his familiar 'oldies'.

Here we find half a dozen nonoriginal experiencing a rebirth through Ferry's strange personal vision, along with five of what are presumably, Bryan's favourite songs from the Roxy Music files.

While the Roxy remakes neither threaten the original versions, nor alter my feelings toward the songs, I like "Casanova" (moved along here by Paul Thompson's thumping beat), and the lovely "Sea Breezes." This song, quite possibly the best thing Ferry has written, would be a welcome addition to any record.

Ferry has gathered a fine band around him for this set. The instrumental attack, elemental and without frills, is spearheaded by guitarist Chris Spedding and boss brassman Chris Mercer. Bryan, himself, touches keyboards, and mouth organ at various points throughout.

The title cut is actually a reworking of an old Wilbur Harrison tune, "Let's Work Together". Done in honour of Bryan's recent engagement to superstar model Gerry Hall, he has added such lines as, "the marriage vow is very sacred" and "consider our child, how can he be happy without his mom and pop".

The track itself is good, crisp, straight-ahead rock'n'roll, led by Mercer's horn riffs. Ferry oscillated unpredictably between camping it up and sounding dead serious - to his usual interesting effect. A big hit earlier this year in England, "Let's Stick Together" should follow suit on this side of the Atlantic.

Chris Spedding's dangerous rock'n'roll guitar issues its warning on "The Price of Love", and rings out accusingly on "Shame, Shame, Shame". Both are first-rate rockers.

Remodel" and "It's Only Love" are a step in the wrong direction, (Ferry's voice doesn't go well with them), but the latter song, by Lennon-McCartney, still proves the perfect vehicle for Ferry's histrionics.

To those Bryan Ferry fans who are also Roxy Music fans, it may seem that they're getting only half an album because of the Roxy numbers included. Still, compared to many albums on the market, even that half may be well worth the price.

For those unfamiliar with Ferry, Let's Stick Together serves as an excellent, and very accessible, introduction to his art-past and present.

The female singers on "Remake-

... and McCoy Tyner lines up the superstars

by Paul Trane

We have lived to see the days of the rock super-group personified by Blind Faith, and, to my mind the original Mahavishnu Orchestra. If such an assemblage of jazz superstars is conceivable, such is the lineup on McCoy Tyner's new release Trident.

McCoy Tyner, well known astral traveller of the keyboards (acoustic, I hasten to add), is a direct extension of the late pioneer John Coltrane. The Coltrane experience has earned Tyner the distinction of being a member of a handful of young musicians involved in uncompromising non-commercial jazz. Many critics contend that modern jazz is dead in the seventies and indeed when we do examine today's innovators they appear as extrapolations on the frontiers opened by Coltrane, Coleman, and Taylor in the sixties. The originality of the music is not the issue here and the quality is never in question.

Elvin Jones, polyrhythmic innovator, handles the drumming here. He is no stranger to the style of McCoy Tyner, himself being an integral member of the Coltrane quartet. Downbeat Critics' Choice for the best drummer in the world for many years standing, Jones' high preconceived timekeeping role which haunted drummers in the past. Syncopated accents and propulsive rhythms far over-shadow the flash and speed of the common man's drum demigod, Buddy Rich.

Ron Carter is a professional in every sense. For years Carter has provided the backbone of virtually every CTI album of the past with superlative, smooth bass lines.

The trio performs as a remarkably integrated unit. The major change in this album by Tyner is his return to his talented friends for sidemen, a touch of experimental harpsichord and celeste, and the inclusion of extraneous material. Tyner has selected material from his mentor John Coltrane, Thelonious Monk, and South American Antonio Carlos Jobim. The result is a fresh variety of tones and colours painted here. From the tender ballad of Monk's "Ruby, My Dear" to the drum exposition simply entitled "Elvin Sir Jones" the versatility of Tyner, Jones, and Carter have collaborated to produce one of the superb jazz LP's of 1976.

Gaelts are superb; yet miss playoffs

Ed Andrew [No. 40]

by Tom Shand

All-star guard, Randy Edgeworth, in one of his more philosophical moments, once put collegiate football into perspective in saying, "Who's going to know the difference in ten years, anyway?"

On Friday night at Lansdowne Park in Ottawa, "Edge" and the boys provided themselves and their loyal fans who made the trek to Bytown with memories which will never die as they shellacked the Ottawa U Gee Gees, 19-0.

The Gaelts had been keying themselves for this match ever since their loss to Ottawa, two weeks before. They wanted to be known as more than just "the first team to score on the Gee Gees". I have never seen a team more ready for a game than were the Golden Gaelts on Friday night. They came onto the field confident, well-prepared, and with a collectivity of purpose focused solely on victory.

The Gee Gees went into the game with an eighteen-game winning streak dating back to 1974 and the billing as the nation's top ranked team. Gee Gees placed 11 men on the O-QIFC Eastern division all-star team including super-back Mike Murphy. Murphy needed only five points to break Neil Lumsden's league scoring record and a handful of yards to break Mark Bragagnolo's O-QIFC single-season rushing record of 1,010 yards.

The Ottawans emerged from battle as a thoroughly defeated team. They had not only lost, but they had been whitewashed for the first time in five years, thereby forcing Murphy to wait until next year to try to break Lumsden's record mark of 148 points in one season.

The Gee Gees only consolation is that they will not have to face the Golden Gaelts again next weekend in playoff action as the men in gold lost the playoff nod to the Bishop's Gaitors. Gaitors and Gaelts finished with identical 5 and 2 records but Gaitors won the only game between the teams and therefore they will advance. Bishop's defeated Concordia by a score of 24 to 23 on Saturday to register that all-important fifth victory.

Although many of the Gaelts looked upon the playoffs as only icing on the cake, nevertheless it is unfortunate that any of the sweetness of their victory should be tinged by this unusual circumstance. There is no doubt that Gaelts are a better football team than the Gaitors and would fare better in post-season play. However, Queen's had the misfortune of meeting Bishop's in their first league game with a defence that had not quite come together and consequently came up marginally short. One other factor in Bishop's favour was that they only met Ottawa once, a game which they lost 52-0.

For several Gaelts, Friday night's game was the last of their collegiate football careers. Included in this group is Darrel Penner who earned his fourth consecutive all-star nomination. Penner exemplified on Friday the type of play which should earn him all-Canadian recognition once again. Penner is the keystone of a defence which has matured into quite possibly the best all-round unit in the country and is also the "prime minister" of the specialty teams.

It was in the latter role that Penner's brilliance shone through most vividly as he returned punts for gains of 70 and 48 yards, thereby setting up the Gaelts 19 points.

Until Darrel's 70-yard return early in the second quarter neither team had been able to take command. Errors and defence were the name of the game. Dave Best fumbled while hurdling a tackler on the Gaelts' only kickoff return. Two series later O'Doherty fell on his pass pattern and Latham's pass was picked off by Sandy Gray. It could have been a very ominous start for the Gaelts except for three great defensive stands which were aided by Gee Gees penalties.

Bob Vanderwater [No. 33] exemplifies the great personal effort which allowed the Gaelts to humble the mighty Gee Gees on Friday night

Notes

Seven Gaelts made the O-QIFC Eastern division all-star team. They were Randy Edgeworth, Doug Lowry and place kicker Blaine Shore from the offence, and Dick Bakker, Mike O'Connor, Darrel Penner and Jim D'Andrea from the defence. Bakker and Ross Francis (playing for the injured Randy Buchanan) were outstanding in stopping Murphy inside. Alan Gette made many key tackles before leaving with a leg injury.

Interceptions by D'Andrea and Balsom gave the Gaelts 16 for the year which is best in the league. D'Andrea had 7 for the year which topped all individuals. Both D'Andrea and Balsom dropped passes. Balsom had a 110-yard touchdown, but he forgot the ball. Doug Latham was very sharp in his passing and called a fine game. Blaine Shore missed one convert and field-goal which hit the post. Wright outpunted Heney for Ottawa as Hundt for Ottawa was not dressed.

Gaelts' head coach Doug Hargreaves commented prior to the Homecoming game that, "Ottawa does very few things, but they do them very well". Unfortunately for Dwight Fowler's Gee Gees the Gaelts keyed on these few things and Ottawa quarterbacks Ruddy and LeClerc could not find alternative means of cracking the Gaelts, defence.

Despite missing the playoffs, this team will go down in the memories of those involved with it as a championship team. Credit should be given to Doug Hargreaves and his coaching staff for moulding the 1976 Golden Gaelts into a beautifully functioning unit of which Queen's should be most proud. With a little more luck next year should be even better.

Tournament at R.M.C.

Queen's W-polo wins 2 of 3

RMC hosted a water-polo tournament for the Ontario-East Conference this past weekend at the Queen's pool. The Queen's team played three games, winning two, and barely losing one.

Queen's got off to a slow start against the host team, RMC, but did manage to come out on top with a final score of 10-5. Coach Simon Butler stated at the time that he was most unimpressed with the performance of the team; the play and ball-handling were slow and uncoordinated, the largest statistic being five missed goals on clear breakaways.

Peter Trellus led the Queen's scoring that game with 5 goals. Dave Ardell and Chuck Leighton added two each, and Bob Briscois one.

In Queen's second game, the team came up with a 9-7 loss to the strong University of Toronto team. Queen's, after losing two games to Toronto prior to this game, went into the game with a determined attitude to win this one. Although the Queen's forwards missed a few opportunities in the first quarter, the game was never out of reach until the final minute of the last quarter.

Cross-Country Champions

Gaels are third in Ont.

The Queen's cross-country team gained third place in the Ontario Universities (O.U.) championships in London on Saturday in a fiercely competitive race held over a challenging 3-loop, 10 km. course.

Western made full use of home advantage to take the title with 56 points ahead of U of T with 76, Queen's with 81 and Waterloo with 82. Ten teams finished. The standard of this year's race was so high that the runners recorded 9 of the 10 best times ever for this course.

The race started at a hectic pace as competitors jostled for places on the narrow trail, but Bryan Stride, last year's winner from Brock, soon opened up a lead to take the race and break Grant McLaren's course record.

Behind Stride, Adam Shoemaker, the Queen's team captain ran his finest race to defeat such rivals as Dyon (U of T) and Millar (Western). After dropping Dyon at 7 km., Adam ran solo in second spot to be the only runner within a minute of the winner. This superb performance by 'The Shoe' ensured him a place on the Ontario University team in the Interprovincial championships on November 6th (Adam's birthday).

Queen's second finisher was O.U. 1500-metre champion Bob McCormick in 10th spot, an improvement of three places from last year, and a Golden performance for a

In the last minute, Dave Ardell was ejected from the game after his third major foul, and Peter Trebuss was given a game misconduct for rough play, leaving a total of five players in the water against Toronto's seven.

The game was a very hard-fought, physical game, with neither team giving any ground to the other. Toronto player George Gross - also an Olympic Team member, was held to two goals by the defensive effort of Dave Ardell.

Mitch Dent was a four-goal score for Queen's; Bruce Evenden, Ardell and Trebuss added one each.

The final game for Queen's was against the York University team which was out to win its second game after defeating RMC. The game was an anti-climactic event for the Queen's team.

On the score after the first period, 2-1 for Queen's, York might have been awarded the game for tenacity and desire, as Queen's had previously beaten York in two top-sided games. Queen's did come back to build up a commanding lead, finishing the game with a 16-4 win. The scoring for Queen's was Trebuss with 7 goals, track miler over this gruelling distance. Our usual number two Claus 'Rover' Rinne had a rare off-day dropping to 21st place with stomach problems from an expected placing in the top six.

The team's fourth and fifth scorers ran most of the race together as rookie Brian Stagg finished 23rd, ahead of Mike DeGauda (25th) whose last gasp sprint clinched the team's third place.

Despite some degree of disappointment, coach Walter Eadie, manager Max Barr and the team were not too despondent because of the race. Our goal of three runners in the top 10 and all seven in 25 was achieved, excepting below-par runs from Rinne and non-scorers Dale Friesen (35) and Roger Wheate (36), sixty-six runners finished.

However, the team has had another excellent season, undefeated in Canada until this weekend and winning the Guelph, York and Ontario junior titles. The season's highlights are still to come for Claus Rinne in the Junior Nationals in Halifax on November 20 and for Adam Shoemaker in the Nationals and UAU this week at Guelph.

We are again indebted to coach Walter Eadie for braving the elements, providing endless encouragement and advice and pushing the team to the limits of human endurance!

Dent and Ardell with 3 each, Briscois with 2 and Leighton scoring once.

After this third of four round-robin tournaments, Queen's is assured of a second-place finish in the Eastern conference, with a spot in the Ontario playoffs. Toronto holds first place, York is third and RMC is fourth.

Queen's will participate in an exhibition tournament at McMaster University next week in preparation for their fourth league tournament and the Ontario championships.

Van Camp [9] and Clapp [7] converge on Ottawa goalie Johnston in Gaels' victory.

Gaels have the punch but lack the scoring

by Mark S. Bennett

This past weekend saw the sixth annual Dutch Cup Hockey tournament held at Queen's. Teams invited to compete were Sir Wilfred Laurier, Waterloo, Ottawa and, of course, the host Gaels.

In Friday's opening game Waterloo met a very fired-up Queen's squad. The high level of emotion was expended in the form of trying to decapitate the opposition, taking stupid penalties and trying to play as five individuals when on the ice.

Fortunately the Queen's team escaped the first period without being scored upon, but failed to capitalize on the few Waterloo errors that did occur as well. Early in the second frame Archie Clark scored the first of his two goals, this one on the power play. At the fifteen-minute mark it was Clark again, giving Waterloo a 2-0 lead. At this point it seemed that Gaels' goalkeeper, Andy Schell, was the only one who came to play.

In the third period Bill Daub was left alone in front of Schell and had no trouble making it 3-0. Thirty seconds later Waterloo had the victory, sewn up with its fourth goal, this one coming from Kevin Walker, and Queen's wilted under the teamwork they were opposing. Eric Brubaker rubbed a little salt into the Gaels' wounds as he blasted a thirty-five footer past the shell-shocked Schell. The Gaels were unable to generate any offence as they directed only 13 shots at the Waterloo goal.

This game doubled as the opening game of the regular QUAA season as well as a tournament game. Including the loss on the scoreboard Queen's will be missing the services of Ned MacIntyre, out with a partial separation of his right shoulder, and Ron Shepard who is still having problems with his knee, recently operated on. Add these to the injury list that already includes regulars Kevin Treacy (stretched knee ligaments), Willie Wing (bruised thigh) and Dave Eaton (flu), and it becomes a little more obvious why the Gaels showed such a dismal offensive record.

In the final against the host, RMC, the aggressive and always hustling Dave Dempster grabbed an amazing

In the second game the Ottawa U. Gee Gees met the Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks who were coming from a big win over U. of T. This game proved to be much more entertaining as both teams stuck to hockey. Laurier jumped into a 5-1 first period lead and then fell back into a defensive shell. The Gee Gees kept pecking and were rewarded with two goals in the second period and then two more in the third. Ottawa had a chance to win in the final minutes but Laurier goalie Al MacSorley came up with an enormous save. Just 46 seconds into overtime Peter Lochead finished off a slick passing play to put Laurier into the final against Waterloo.

Saturday's consolation round saw Queen's playing Ottawa. Having had a night to contemplate their last effort, the Gaels seemed determined to play as a team. Led again by the superb goaltending of Andy Schell and defenceman Glenn Furgoch, Queen's carried much of the play to the Gee Gees in the first period. Eight minutes into the second frame Joe Pecaric, a transfer from Laurentian, cranked a shot off teammate Jay 26 rebounds, while hot-handed Henry Garbaty hit 90 percent from the floor for 19 points.

Scoring over three games played were Henry Garbaty with 37 points, Rob Smart with 33 points; Derek Swinnard, 31 points; Sean Pritchard, 27 points; Andy Boniwell, 23 points; Dave Dempster, Kim Carlton with 17 points each, Bob Cooney, 16 points, Bruce Nickel, 10 points, Steve Simmons 7 points and the rookies Dave Calnan, and Mike Flenniken each with 4 points.

B. ball on move with RMC wins

by Pete Still

Queen's Gaels defeated RMC 59-54 on Saturday night to clinch a standing of 3-0 in games in the RMC Basketball Tournament last weekend. On Friday night Queen's handed Bishop's an 82-76 beating and on Saturday afternoon Queen's crushed Niagara 85-59.

In the game with Bishop's, team captain Derek Swinnard, shooting from the outside end-line, hit for 21 from the outside end-line, hit for 21 pts. Meanwhile the big men, Andy Boniwell, Henry Garbaty, and Dave Dempster worked the inside lane to grab down a combined 32 rebound between. Coach Pete Smith's mystery defence had Bishop's confused most of the game. These players looked quite talented on the floor.

In the final against the host, RMC, the aggressive and always hustling Dave Dempster grabbed an amazing

Babcock in the crease and the Gaels led 1-0. Six minutes later it was Babcock again this time giving Earl Moulton a good lead pass and 'Pearl' with a good move at the blue-line beat Bill Thompson high on the stick side. Again it was a defensive miscue which allowed Ottawa to get back into the contest. Kevin Benson was ignored in front of Schell and slipped a low backhand past him. Schell redeemed himself in the dying moments when, with the Gaels shorthanded and the Ottawa goalie pulled in favor of an extra attacker, he robbed Benson of the equalizer. Of the two games this was by far the better effort from the Gaels'.

In the tournament finale both Waterloo and cross-town rivals, Laurier, showed flashes of superb hockey interspersed with rough and tumble shinny. The officiating, although of OHA level, was dismal and it detracted from the game. The lead changed hands five times before Laurier scored the questionable equalizer with just a minute and a half to go. Again overtime was the order of the afternoon but this time the sudden-death session ended deadlocked.

Tournament director Ed Deans then implemented showdown whereby each team had five penalty shots. Both Laurier's Al MacSorley and Waterloo's Bruce Morgan made outstanding saves but MacSorley could hang on only so long. Waterloo emerged with a 6-3 victory and the championship.

Queen's have many new faces in their lineup and if first year coach Mike Babcock can mold the Gaels' into a cohesive unit, the team could be the best in many seasons. Terry Angel, ejected in the second game for fighting, was not up to par, being hampered by a bad back. Andy Schell, a transfer from R.P.I. in New York, was a standout in both games. Joe Pecaric and Glenn Furgoch, both from Laurentian, played good solid defensive hockey. John MacIntyre showed superb forchecking abilities in Saturday's game. Frank Coffey, back after a year at the University of Paris, has been appointed as captain.

Through the whole tournament Queen's had a great winning attitude and a competitive spirit even from the players on the bench. Things look very bright for the team this year.

This weekend Queen's opens its season with a game against one of the top teams in the nation, Laurentian. The game is this Friday night at 8:15 in Bartlett Gym

Carleton's drinkers

Last year the 9,224 full-time and 7,267 part-time students at Carleton University drank 1.3 million pints of beer at the eight campus pubs. This comes to 38 gallons per student per year, twice the national average of 18 gallons a year.

Ron Mertor, manager of a campus pub, expects his sales this year to reach $690,000, more than double the $316,000 students spent in 1974.

The heavy drinking has caused alarm among Carleton University doctors. Juanita Casselman, a university doctor has urged the action by the Carleton University Student's Association. The University of British Columbia's Student Council voted Oct. 20 to close the pub and barred liquor in the student union to curb vandalism and liquor abuse.

Blow to crime in Mtl.

Vincenzo Cotroneo and Paolo Violio of Montreal, along with John Papalio of Hamilton and Sheldon Schwartz of Toronto, were jailed for six years on charges of conspiracy. The sentencing of the first two leaves the Cotroneo-Violio crime family of Montreal "in a shambles" according to a senior Montreal police officer.

The decline of the Cotroneo-Violio crime empire was caused by the repeated televised commission inquiry into organized crime in Quebec. A senior Police officer attributed the decline to the public exposure. He noted that seven or eight years ago the Montreal police would have been "over the moon" because of the Toronto conviction of Cotroneo and Violio. Now their convictions were just "nails in their coffin."

Rhodesian follow up

The question of whether majority rule means the same to Prime Minister Ian Smith as it does to black Rhodesians was still unanswered as the Geneva conference went into recess Friday. Mr. Smith made no mention of the majority rule in his speech, speaking instead of "stability and good government." Rhodesia foreign minister, Pieter van der Byl, later said that majority rule did not necessarily mean one man, one vote.

Black nationalist delegations however, equate majority rule with one man, one vote, and wouldn't be in Geneva if not for Smith's acceptance of this principle as evidenced by his acceptance of Kissinger's proposals on Sept. 24. They also reject Smith's right to make terms at all, saying that Britain is constitutionally responsible for Rhodesia.

Both Bishop Abel Muzorewa, head of the African National Council and Robert Mugabe accused Rhodesian security forces of indiscriminate arrest and torture of blacks. Van der Byl denied the accusations, claiming that Rhodesian security forces were fighting guerrilla forces that were terrorizing the countryside.

Outbreak in Lebanon

In a new outburst of violence since the latest ceasefire was declared nine days ago, more than 78 people have been killed and 100 wounded in fighting in and around Beirut. The fighting started Thursday night.

The Christian interior minister and former president, Camille Chamoun accused leftist Druze Moslems of attacking four Christian villages in the region of Clouf, 25 miles southeast of Beirut. He promised a "swift painful retaliation" unless the attack was halted. Meanwhile, leftist leader Kamal Jumblutt called for Moslem-Christian reunion in Clouf "because the war is about to over."

Blazing fire in Japan

A massive fire in Lakato destroyed more than 1000 buildings and left 4000 people homeless. The total destruction of the city was prevented only by the Nito River, which bisects the city.

Firemen fought for 11 hours to control the blaze as 65-mile per hour winds spread the blaze more than half a mile. At the end two men were missing and twelve people injured.

The fire is believed to have started in an overheated boiler in a movie theatre, and is the worst to have hit Japan since a 1961 blaze in Armori, ZPG close at hand?

The Worldwatch Institute in Washington reported that world population growth has slowed dramatically in the past five years. The report said that the trend indicates the world's population will not double before the year 2000 as predicted by most demographers.

The slowdown is attributed to falling birth rates in European countries and family planning in parts of Asia and Latin America. However, in many of the poorer countries the slowed population growth is caused by food shortages pushing up the death rate.

Transkei

In the precise last Friday of the situation in Transkei, South Africa, a few readers noted that the last line of the article was misleading. The true independence of that country is somewhat in doubt. The Journal item was abbreviated from interviews with blacks in Transkei published in the Globe and Mail, Oct. 27. A misleading impression of the interviews was taken from the article.

The Reuter News Service release read as follows: "Interviews with Transkeians reveal a mixed attitude to independence. On the one hand, blacks are glad of a measure of freedom from South Africa's apartheid system. On the other hand, they are suspicious of how far freedom goes."

plant.

Mr. MacDonald mentioned that public monies have been used to help phase out smaller cheese plants, with the large processors picking up the customers. He noted that in the case of the Saputo cheese plant local farmers, their organizations and even the Ontario Milk Marketing Board look favorably on the establishment of a new plant.

Public schools

A list of 66 school boards revealed that Frontenac County had a higher per-pupil education cost than all but five of these boards in 1975. This year ten extra teachers were hired to teach elementary school here since projection figures proved inaccurate. 346 fewer students than expected showed up this fall in the classrooms.

It was also pointed out that Frontenac has a higher-than-average percentage of better-than-average teachers, that is teachers in higher categories and with larger amounts of experience. Special programs are carried out here that result in smaller classes and lower teacher to pupil ratios.

Cheese

Donald MacDonald, the Ontario NDP's critic for agricultural and food matters, has drawn attention to the difficulties being experienced by the Saputo Cheese Specialty plant in opening a plant in Hawkesbury. It seems that larger processors try to limit competition by attempting to persuade the government not to grant the necessary license. There is a danger that the Milk Industry Act might be changed so that the Ontario Milk Commission could refuse the license on the grounds that there is not enough demand in the area to warrant the establishment of a new

Of 441 people who answered the questionnaires 87.5 per cent do not wish to sell their land, 8.4 per cent express willingness to sell in the future, and 4.1 per cent are undecided. TIARA members are working on a plan for future development in the area.

Visiting journalist, author on native peoples:

They're challenging us-give them nationhood

As the second guest speaker for the Chancellor Dunning Trust Lecture series, Hugh McCullum challenged the audience to re-examine their values and their belief in the supposedly democratic society which exists in Canada today.

A noted journalist and staff person with Project North, where he helps maintain liaison between natives in the north negotiating land claims and the southern white population, McCullum spoke on the topic of "Institutional Violence: A Northern Perspective". He questioned who the aggressor was in the Canadian north, where institutionalized violence has existed for the past couple of years. The purpose of his argument was to illustrate the fact that it is not the native people who are violent, but those who are wound up in the "growth ethic" and only seek to achieve commercial and technological growth regardless of the violations they incur to the surrounding people and environment.

Threats of violence have been attributed to the native people largely as a result of statements made before the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry. Such statements propound the heartfelt beliefs of the native people - they will not allow the pipeline to be built through "the heart of their land", regardless of the cost involved. McCullum believes the actions of the oil companies and their supporters in the north have done nothing less than create a colonial relationship resulting ultimately in total dehumanization of the native peoples. The pipeline project was conceived and designed in governmental secrecy without consultation to native groups. In answer to a question following his presentation, McCullum felt the Pipeline Inquiry had been established as a cosmetic measure to pacify these native groups by granting them token recognition; but that by setting someone with the integrity of Justice Thomas Berger as head, the impact of the inquiry had been drastically increased.

Dunning trust lecturer Hugh McCullum told a Queen's audience last Tuesday that Canada's native people will not allow the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline to be built through "the heart of their land" regardless of the costs involved.

McCullum illustrated how violence becomes institutionalized through the exercise of government and corporate power. He exemplified this institutionalization by citing the October crisis of 1970; many Canadians have become so accustomed to infringements of their fundamental liberties that they cite the implementation of the emergency War Measures legislation as an example of "decisive leadership".

McCullum's definition of violence is "any act or set of actions that creates suffering, resulting in the victims being trapped in poverty, starvation, racial inferiority, colonialism, welfare and alcoholism". He believes violence has been in effect in the north as the multi national corporations and the government have taken disproportionately large amounts of resources, thus transferring more wealth to the wealthy countries and taking potential wealth from the poor. McCullum pointed out the circular hypocrisy of the Canadian social order as it exists today, and how this contributes to violent action: "we have failed to understand that violence on the part of the oppressed minorities springs primarily from rage - and rage, in turn, from the frustration that change is not being realized, that justice is not being done".

Hugh McCullum is concerned with the violence that is being done to the native people and their reactions to this violence, as they challenge our deepest values. "They are challenging us to allow them nationhood in their terms, an association of land and people, independent only within the country of Canada. They are asking for democracy in its best and original concept, where all people are equal and have equal rights and equal responsibilities and not a nation where there are elites. Perhaps that is why they are considered to be such a serious domestic threat to peace and security, because they are challenging us to fundamental social change, to begin doing what we have merely paid lip service to for many years".

Fees, employment, housing & quality are national themes for NSD Tues.

[Adapted from CUP] - At a National Union of Students conference last May, student leaders from across Canada decided to initiate a National Student Day (NSD) to demonstrate student concern about cutbacks in education funding, tuition hikes, decreasing financial aid for students and record high student unemployment. NSD will take place next Tuesday, November 9.

The nationwide activity was adopted by most regional and provincial student organizations at their respective conferences. But NSD has been conceived as a local "grass roots" effort - so the emphasis has been on individual campus initiative, with co-ordination at the provincial and national levels.

Parrott agrees to come to aid of loan victims

In response to the criticism of the Ontario Student Assistance Programme by Bob Bain, the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Dr. Parrott stated that he would personally intervene on behalf of college and university students who would have to withdraw from school if they have not received their student assistance within two weeks.

"I am very happy that the Minister has stated that if I or any other MPP provides him with the names of students who will have to leave a college or university within the next two weeks unless they get their student's loan, that he will personally ensure that the students receive their loans in time," said Bob Bain. "Don't forget to get the magic file number and batch number from the Students Award Officer at your respective college or university. Without these two numbers Dr. Parrott will not be able to find your file."

The theme of NSD's will be "a University Education Worth It" and activities include workshops, discussions, debates and films. Regional and national coordination has consisted mainly of poster, pamphlet and leaflet campaigns on the major NSD themes. Ontario Federation of Students staff member Allan Colombeck said that members of the OFS executive would be meeting with members of the Ontario Provincial cabinet.

Student leaders have been careful to emphasize that NSD is to be a "day of discussion" or "day of concern" and not a "day of protest" as some have termed it. There are to be no pickets or demonstrations although co-ordinating committees had some trouble defining what constituted a minimum of activity for the national day of concern.

As it now stands, provinces from British Columbia to Ontario all report extensive preparations on the major campuses for NSD. Manitoba appears to be the weakest in provincial strategy and Quebec is uninvolved.

Ontario's tuition fees

If tuition fees rise this year it will not be surprising for anyone. Students have faced one tuition fee increase since the early 1960's that was a $100 increase in 1972. Four years ago there was a great controversy about withholding fees which organized under the slogan "I'm not paying!" This year we anticipate that students will accept the increase with a feeling of inconvenience and helplessness, more worried about finishing essays than next year's fees.

Best estimates presently predict an increase of $175.00, not $100.00 as tipped by the Ontario Federation of Students last week. An increase of $175.00 would place tuition at roughly $775.00 across the province for most undergraduates at university. An increase of this order would also bring Ontario fees to the highest in Canada, replacing the present leaders: New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Some observers speculate that the fee increase may not be $175 for political reasons. A fair number of Ontario Cabinet ministers come from ridings which contain universities and colleges. With a provincial election in the offing and given the poor government showing among university students the last time out, an increase of $175 may not be approved. Still, an increase of this magnitude would make the students' contribution towards costs roughly 20 percent - the figure which minister of Colleges and Universities Dr. Harry Parrott feels would be appropriate. By fixing tuition at a percentage of costs, tuition would automatically escalate on an annual basis.

Some members of the OFS have argued that there is no reason for the relative token contribution toward total costs from students. Why burden students with 15-20 percent of the cost, they ask, why not simply tax more money from the corporations who benefit so obviously from our education? Tuition does represent a small proportion of university costs and yet it serves two important functions. The payments relieve the public purse of that amount contributed per student (there are roughly 200,000 university and community college students in this province), in addition to ensuring an awareness that one has sacrificed a sum of money to get a higher education. Few people realize the full cost of obtaining a degree (when one considers the salaries they could be earning, the cost is well into the tens of thousands); tuition is the cost associated with attendance at a post secondary institution.

Why have tuition fees at all?

This token payment, then, should not be altogether removed but should it indeed go up? Is it reasonable to believe that tuition fees should remain at the same level? Unfortunately, we are at a point in the development of this province when more independent resources will have to be tapped for the economic health of Ontario. We've said before that it ill serves the interests of students in this province to expect the government to pay the fare only to graduate into a weak economic situation produced by inflated government spending. All other departments of government have met with reduced financing and have passed several costs on to service recipients in the form of higher prices. Students, curiously, have been exempted from this government policy which has been in existence since shortly after our economy took its downturn in 1973.

The opportunity to develop oneself in this way is one which should be paid for and recognized by students in the form of tuition fees.

But it is an opportunity which should exist for all intellectually qualified people in Canada. For those of limited means the tuition fees, in combination with the associated costs of books and living expenses, present a difficult barrier to overcome. The Ontario Student Assistance Programme exists to lend aid to students. The gifted student can receive assistance from other sources.

Ontario has not, though, achieved the equality desired in the determination of who attends the universities. We may never achieve this goal. All we can do is work towards it to ensure that to those who can and earnestly want to be students and to those who earnestly need financial assistance, the province makes easily available the means to pursue a higher education.

Fyfe declares candidacy: Queen's prof. first in 20 years seeking council seat

by Michael Scott

Dr. Stewart Fyfe, Associate Professor of Political Studies is the first active member of Queen's academic staff to seek a position on the Kingston City Council in over twenty years. Dr. Fyfe has announced his intention to seek the aldermanic seat for Victoria Ward in the upcoming December civic elections.

Dr. Fyfe, a resident of Kingston since 1945, has logged seven years with the Kingston Planning Board including two years as chairman, three years as Deputy City Clerk and many years as a teacher of courses in municipal government, planning and public administration at Queen's. He organized the Kingston Planning Department in the early fifties when the City of Kingston absorbed areas which have since become the Cataraqui and Frontenac Wards. Dr. Fyfe's Ph.D. from Manchester is on government and town planning.

Dr. Fyfe is anxious to dispel notions of the ivory tower academic often associated with members of his profession. He stresses his record as city planner and his community involvement to this end.

The encouragement of tourism and community recreation are issues Dr. Fyfe would like to see pursued. He sees Kingston as "a good place to live and work, combining an awareness of its past, a progressive community spirit and an outstanding natural environment". The promotion of tourism at such sites as the Courthouse, Kingston's cathedrals, and the Market has tended to be overlooked in favor of that for Bellevue House and other more 'established' points of interest, he maintains.

Dr. Stewart Fyfe, Associate professor of political studies at Queen's.

A fuller community use of the Olympic site and an improvement of access to, and use of the waterfront and Little Cataraqui River, are important steps in developing community recreation in Kingston. These steps and the promotion of Kingston as a sailing center are goals Dr. Fyfe has expressed interest in following, should he be elected.

Through more selective industrial

An advocate of purposeful thought Conversation is education

by Scott Haig and Jennifer Warren

"Cherish the art of conversation," This was the central message which Dr. W. B. Rice delivered to a group of about 30 students who attended the first talk in the Last Lecture Series on Tuesday evening. Dr. Rice, the Head of the Engineering Department, suggested that true conversation was the act of feeling or thinking along with another, as distinct from debate or contention. In observing the university community, Dr. Rice said he was aware of the temptation to substitute debate for conversation. In itself this is perhaps harmless, but the lecturer identified the way in which we talk to each other as a reflection of our attitudes towards others, which he considered very important.

Another element to the problem, growth, Dr. Fyfe feels a greater diversity of employment would result. Presently in Kingston, employment opportunities for those without the technological skill required by companies such as Alcan, Dupont and C.I.L. are extremely limited. Dr. Fyfe is prepared to use his experience in civic and development planning in order to readjust industrial growth thus increasing job opportunities in Kingston.

Conservative estimates place 1500 of the 8400 votes in Victoria Ward in the hands of Queen's students. An additional 300 to 400 votes belong to faculty and University support staff. Dr. Fyfe feels the student population is becoming far less transitory and as a result student interest in civic affairs has seen a marked increase over past years. This growing civic awareness in students is bound to lead them to a more active role in city politics, according to Dr. Fyfe.

according to Dr. Rice was the manner in which we put "institutions" before "people." This was illustrated by the perceived primacy of the institution as opposed to individuals in modern day corporations. Closer to home, at Queen's for instance, professors might try to secure appointments which will be prestigious for the university or department, and often become preoccupied with standards without inquiring whether they are valid measurements of achievement.

Dr. Rice also pointed out the lack of communication which ensues from contention rather than conversation. "Debate flourishes, eclipsing both conversation and education because... education means to educate and draw out, which to me implies purposeful thinking along with another." Dr. Rice asserted. If we are able to shirk our competitive mentality and develop an empathy towards one another through the art of conversation, "We would transform all the mechanisms of schooling-lectures, seminars, laboratories and even research into effective elements of education." Purposeful thinking together would require hard work for both parties, transforming a one-sided lecture into an educational conversation.

Dr. Rice prescribed that the art of conversation can be developed by us here at Queen's, "not by challenging others to do something about it", but by attempting in our daily activities to promote conversation, the purposeful thinking along with one another. The lecture concluded with the assertion that "the satisfaction attending a goal reached together" in other words the outcome of real conversation "far outweighs and outlasts the selfish pleasure of vanquishing an opponent in debate."

Canada's greatest threat is Int'l terrorism

by Annette Nicholson

Ex-principal Corry introduced Monday night, the first of a series of three Dunning Trust Lectures on Violence, Politics and the State. He set the stage for the first speaker, Robin Bourne, with general remarks on the nature of violence, the irrationality and romanticism of the use of violence for political ends. In the end, he said, violence defeats us all.

Colonel Robert (Robin) Bourne, C.D., Assistant Deputy Minister to the Ministry of the Solicitor-General, responsible for Police and Security, spoke on Violence and Political Authority. Mr. Bourne is an advisor to the Ministers and Deputy Ministers on matters of internal security and police planning and policy.

The greatest security threat to Canada today, in the view of Bourne, is international terrorism. The internal threat is only a moderate concern. This has not always been so: for example the FLQ and student unrest were dominant domestic sources of security concern, during the sixties and early seventies. Just after the last war, the greatest threat seemed to Bourne to be espionage, in the context of the Cold War.

Bourne cited several notorious incidents of international terrorism such as the 1972 massacre at Munich of Israeli athletes and the recent hijacking, which culminated in the daring raid on Entebbe airport. Bourne used these examples to bring Canadian security precautions into focus and to explain the fences and security forces in Kingston this summer. It was felt that a serious threat from international terrorists did exist and that elaborate planning and precautions were necessary to prevent an incident of international proportions.

Bourne explained that although, security measures are sometimes distasteful, they are also necessary. He said that the need for security is indisputable but the methods of security forces is a subject of debate, since in democratic states there is the problem of the possible infringement of civil rights. Although civil rights are sometimes endangered, Bourne felt that the responsibility of the government is to protect citizens from violence, of all kinds including political violence. Political violence differs from purely criminal violence when the implications are greater than in an ordinary murder. In political crimes there is often an international overtone; for example supplies of arms, money and men may be denied from other nations.

Therefore, Bourne stressed the need for cooperation. International cooperation has been restricted by failure to obtain a definition of international terrorism "one man's terrorist is the other man's freedom fighter", said Bourne. He did mention, however that international cooperation has increased and was magnificent with regard to the Montreal Olympics.

Cooperation within Canada can involve three levels of government, and different police forces and security agencies. For example the administration of justice and the enforcement of the Criminal Code, which is a federal statute, and the responsibilities of the province. Therefore the response to terrorism has to be carefully orchestrated.

Mr. Bourne found it hard to be optimistic about the future, saying that the threat from terrorism will continue as long as there are conflicts between groups. Bourne was concerned about the way Canadians will react to the coming economic hardships, since most of us have been brought up with great expectations.

Campus Comment this week asked Queen's students their opinions on the upcoming Suzie Q week and whether they thought it was important as a social event.

Sylvia Edwards

Sylvia (Rehab '78) felt that Suzie Q week was "a lot of fun, a nice break in the school year." When asked whether or not she felt the women at Queen's were liberated, she replied, "definitely not, a girl would not ask a guy out simply because he is not liberated; some would be put off."

"Two types of girls invite men to events during Suzie Q week: those who do it for the fun of it, and those who never get asked out and want to get out and ask someone they know and like." Sylvia felt that the latter group might gain that extra confidence needed to reverse the roles "even after the week is over." "In Rehab there is only one guy... its the only chance we have to ask someone out!!"

Harvey Brownstone

"Obviously, there are a number of women who aren't liberated enough to even ask a guy to dance. Harvey (Arts '79) commented that "if Suzie Q week gives these women the confidence and the legitimacy to express their social characters, then the week has achieved its purpose." He went on to say that "for those girls who are worldly enough, they won't need it anyway."

Harvey felt that Suzie Q week was "an essential element in the social life of a university... particularly here at Queen's, where so many people feel that there is a cliquiness or a division among the circles of friends. So many people find it difficult to initiate relationships. He concluded by saying that "Suzie Q week gives the women in this university a chance to transcend the boundaries of social conformity."

Beth Moon

Beth (Arts '79) felt that "Suzie Q week is a good opportunity for people who have never had the guts to reverse the roles to do so when things are planned. They won't feel that they are totally by themselves." She empathized with the Queen's Women's Centre; "I can see their point of view: women should feel that they can ask guys out without making sure that it is within a certain period of time. That sort of attitude should be found every day."

Beth felt that Suzie Q week was "a good beginning; it makes people realize that the roles must be changed. It shouldn't be infringement on the right of women to ask men out." She concluded by saying, "It's also another excuse for a party that's what Queen's events are for."

"They work because they enjoy it..."

Prof. claims working life evolving

by Chris Hall

In a lecture delivered yesterday, Professor Stanley Seashore argued that, "the quality of working life is evolving." Stating that conditions of the near future will demand jobs to be more diverse, Professor Seashore sees workers being attracted to jobs for more than just the economic payoff. Jobs which encourage learning, innovation, and present a challenge to the individuals will be the ones most sought after. These additional factors help a person successfully form a full life style which is the most important point for people today.

Professor Seashore continued his argument by noting that, "People no longer make a distinction between work and non-work. People today work even when they do not have to. They work because they enjoy it and obtain a personal satisfaction from being able to do what they enjoy." This change in attitude among the workers requires a similar change in attitude among management. Management does not have to abandon earlier more basic values, it simply has to take concerns of society into play. A job is no longer a private matter between a worker and employer.

The crux of professor Seashore's argument revolved around the idea that these changes in the quality of working life are similar around the world. Citing Japan, Australia and Russia, Professor Seashore gave examples of how each has instituted policies to stimulate not only the quality of work, but the worker's interest in the job he does. Workers all over the world take the jobs which are best organized, most challenging and which are set in the best possible conditions.

Professor Seashore closed his lecture by stressing the need for more diversity in the choice of jobs, the need for closer relationships between management and worker and the need for more participative mechanisms to enhance the interests of both parties. "These goals can be accomplished without harming the interests of either group." He expressed optimism that industries in the United States and Canada were well on the way to achieving these goals.

Your views sought on fees

by Anne Johnson

A series of questions discussed by the AMS executive who propose to have them included on the upcoming November referendum, will be presented to Outer Council. Council will be asked to consider them, and if approved, they will debate the issue and hopefully come to a firm conclusion concerning the official AMS stand. The questions are roughly as follows: 1) Do you support the principle of free tuition; 2) Do you support the Ontario government's policy of differential fees for foreign students; and in the event that the Davis government raises tuition fees before the November referendum, 3) Do you support the government's recently announced increase in tuition fees?

According to External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Christie, the policy of the OFS, of which the AMS is a member, supports the principle of free tuition, although implementation of this policy is not realistically foreseen in the near future. For the present, they advocate a continuation of the tuition fee freeze and a commitment to devise a program for universal access to higher education.

Christie also pointed out the fact that in past years, AMS has issued many policy statements strongly supporting free tuition, and last year's commissioner, Peter Lane was committed to this same belief.

It must be noted, however, that student opinion concerning these questions could conceivably run in opposition to the AMS's declared position. In this event, says Christie, "we will clearly have to re-evaluate our stand. But I don't think that is going to happen," he added.

Will be independently run:

A competitive bookstore?

The Campus Bookstore in Clark Hall will soon be facing competition in the form of a new store in the John Deutsch Centre. The nature of this store has yet to be announced.

The present bookstore runs on a "break-even" basis, the textbook sales either losing money or just meeting costs. Bookstore manager Frank Gaudin stated that "anything (in funds) not used for keeping on top of expenses is plunged back into more stock" of textbooks. The main money-making items are the luxury articles such as sweaters and sundries. "Aside from being in the same building" the Engineering Society does not control the actual running of the Bookstore.

It does fall under the control of the Queen's Engineering Society Services Incorporated (QUESSI) group. Also concerned with the way the bookstore functions is the Senate Committee on the Campus Bookstore under the chairmanship of Dr. Robert

Bater, Principal of Queen's Theological College. Due to work loads and scheduling problems the Committee, composed of "three faculty members, one representative of the Board of Trustees and four students" has not met yet this year, but Dr. Bater assured the Journal that the Committee will be getting together in the near future. The Committee's job is to report to the Senate "as to the range and nature of Bookstore services desired by the campus community." The Committee also advises QUESSI as to the desires of the campus concerning the store. The Chairman of the Committee also attends QUESSI board meetings as a speaking observer. As well, the Committee "is to provide a channel whereby the users of the bookstore may have their views on any aspect of the Bookstore's operation heard and brought to QUESSI." To this end the Committee is to advertise and hold one public meeting a year. Dr. Bater stressed the difficulty the Committee had last year in holding such a meeting as part of the problem of "just how to get the view point of the campus community." Finally the Chairman of the Senate Committee is "empowered to bring suggestions of a non-policy nature directly to the attention of the Bookstore manager."

Last year the Senate Committee indicated concern over what kind of facilities will be provided in the Centre. As Dr. Bater understands it "the space was put out to bid and several organizations put in bids, including the Campus Bookstore." The Committee's position is "we would prefer a true bookstore as opposed to one which also deals in sundries" as does the present Bookstore. "We were unanimous in our opposition to the Bookstore, running a smaller version of what is already in existence" which is what "QUESSI would seem to desire."

$1000 award to prof.

Nominations for the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching are being solicited from Queen's students, faculty and alumni.

The Alumni Award, to be presented at Spring Convocation, consists of a Certificate of Merit and a cash award of $1,000.

Candidates for the award must be full-time members of the Queen's University teaching staff, who have completed three years of full-time teaching duties at Queen's. Candidates should have a comprehensive knowledge of the subject they teach. They should be habitually well prepared for teaching sessions including lectures, laboratories, seminars and tutorials.

Nominators should strive to choose professors who have enthusiasm for the subject and the capacity to arouse interest in it among the students. The candidates should also encourage student participation in the teaching-learning process.

Setting a high standard and successfully motivating students to attain such a standard is also an important criterion to keep in mind. Professors who communicate effectively at levels appropriate to the students' capacity are the type that the award strives to recognize.

The utilization of methods of evaluation of student performance which stress an understanding of the subject, rather than just the ability to memorize is a further criterion to be considered by nominators and evaluators. The nominees should be accessible to students outside of class hours and have a reputation for superior teaching, and be recognized for this quality by students and colleagues alike.

Nominations must be signed by five students, faculty or alumni and be submitted to the Director of Alumni Affairs, Queen's University by 14 January 1977. Nominations should include the candidate's name in full, his faculty and discipline, a brief biographical outline, including education and experience, and reasons for recommending him for the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching.

All nominations will be considered by the Teaching Awards Committee, which consists of faculty, student and alumni representatives. The recommendation of the Committee will be forwarded to the Executive Committee of the Board of Directors of the Alumni Association, which has final responsibility for approving the Award.

Tuition up $175 for next year?

TORONTO [CUP] — "I'm not denying or accepting that university funding for 1977-78 is determined," Ontario Minister of colleges and universities Harry Parrott said following his statement that the announcement on possible tuition fee increases will be delayed for a month.

However, a screaming headline in the Toronto Sun Oct. 26 "$175 increase coming in university tuition" has caused some alarm.

"I take it Hoy's (Claire Hoy, author of the article) sources are quite reliable since he worked at one time with the ministry of colleges and universities," David Warner, NDP education critic said.

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) had estimated fees would go up $100. However, information officer Allan Gollombek said, "Hoy's sources are at least as good as ours so it ($175) is likely."

If the estimates hold true and tuition rises to about $775, both Warner and Gollombek point out, it will be the highest in Canada.

"The minister," Warner said, "would love to avoid making an announcement before Nov. 9 (National Student Day) because they don't want to focus political attention on themselves because they are in trouble."

Re-education proposed for adult students

TORONTO [CUP] — More countries are moving toward recurrent education, a policy of lifelong learning through the educational system, according to Dr. Jarl Bengtsson of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

Speaking to students and educators at the University of Toronto recently, Bengtsson said the concept "encompasses all education and is developed along with what's happening in the labor market."

Admitting that educational budgets cannot be tapped as a source of funds, Bengtsson put the onus on business and government.

"This will be the most important source of financing. It is vital because the instrument of paid education leave of absence is vital if the system of recurrent education is to be encouraged."

Arguing that a movement toward recurrent education is a big step toward industrial democracy Bengtsson said, "the time is right for great changes in the world of work in terms of participation."

Bengtsson noted a possible segmentation of the labor force as a result of the policy, however.

"There is one segment that seems to continue up a ladder of success in a career and there is the other segment that seems stuck in a slot where advancement appears nil."

While the main thrust for the policy has come from Europe he said the role North American community colleges are taking in adult education is encouraging.

Club to make world a nudist paradise

UBC students are being asked to join a club dedicated to making the world into a nudists paradise.

The world game club - conceived by Patrick Britten, a 30-year-old welfare recipient and president of the Nude Garden Party would reshape the world by disarming all military forces and cultivating the world's deserts.

Britten said he hit on the idea of getting UBC students involved in the club because of his many visits to Wreck Beach, a nudist beach. "It could become a social club," Britten said. "Maybe we could get together in the nude for meetings, that would be a good beginning."

Much of Britten's philosophy is based on "nude liberation." "Keeping alive the spirit of man, that is the purpose," he said. "Nude liberation is the basket of nature. It is essential to global development. The animal of the body is the controlling force. It can't be surpassed."

Vancouver will be the base for the world game club, Britten said. "I've seen and felt so much and now believe Vancouver should take the lead to promote world development."

Britten said he has spent a small fortune over the years sending mailings with his ideas around the world. If he raises enough money, Britten plans to run for mayor of Vancouver.

Carleton U's manpower finds scab jobs

OTTAWA [CUP] — The Canada Manpower Centre at Carleton University is referring students to jobs at a local newspaper where employees are locked out over a labor dispute.

Manpower officer Ian Miller said Oct. 28 some students had taken jobs through his centre in response to an ad for "divers and helpers" at "excellent wages" from the Ottawa Journal which has kept out its production employees since Oct. 26.

Carleton Manpower's Miller said his office's placement of students at the Journal should not be translated as taking sides in the dispute because "you can look at it both ways."

"If a striking Journal employee wanted to use our services to find a job during the strike, that could be interpreted as us taking the union's side," Miller feels.

Who's got the severe case of tunnel vision at Queen's

by Trish Crowe

Anyone walking past Douglas Library within the last couple of days has no doubt noticed a newly-painted crest near the corner of University and Union. This is not such an unusual occurrence in itself, as many of the Faculties are painting or repainting their year crests. What does make this crest unusual is that it does not signify a specific Faculty or year, rather it is a socialist display.

The initial crest, with black figures on a red background, was well designed and quite attractive. In less than twenty-four hours, however, this was defaced, requiring a second coat, this time, red lettering on a white background. Because the paint was not let alone to dry, the whole appearance is now very unattractive.

It's obvious that whoever defaced the original painting did so because of differing political views. Whether political differences are a sufficient motive to destroy anything, let alone a painted crest, is debatable. Year and Faculty crests are painted all over Queen's sidewalks and are usually left alone. These crests take up about four times as much pavement as does the socialist crest, yet no one seems fit to destroy these.

Is it because the Year crests are seen as works of art that they are left alone? If this is so, then the application of the term 'work of art' could have been applied to the socialist crest with as much justification.

Art is a matter of opinion, as are political beliefs, and just as no one has the right to destroy the Mona Lisa because they feel it's ugly, neither should the socialist crest be altered. Although I do not support many of the policies that the Queen's Socialist Coalition propounds, I feel they are an integral part of the Queen's Community. As such, they should be as free to display their slogan around the University as are all the other organizations on campus. What makes the people from the year societies the only eligible sidewalk artists?

A quote from the letter to the Journal last year fits this situation perfectly. "If one has the right to change or destroy others' expressions of emotion (or belief) which one has named offensive, one has deprived the individual of his supposed right to express himself freely."

The actions of those individuals who destroyed the original socialist crest are both childish and indicative of a severe case of tunnel-vision. Those who cannot see things beyond their textbooks and lectures should not be at this University, for they are allowing their courses to severely limit their education.

Teaching effectiveness:

Classroom improvements

By Dr. Ronald L. Watts, Principal and Vice Chancellor

Since the issue of the degree of interest in Queen's in improving teaching effectiveness has been raised recently, I am devoting my monthly column to this subject.

There are different ways to assess the interest of a university in its teaching effectiveness, of which the grant sought and received from the Ontario University Programme for Instructional Development is only a minor one.

For example, in 1976-76 Queen's University devoted 67.4 per cent of its total operating budget to instructional activities compared with the average for Ontario universities of 63.6 per cent. Ours is one of the highest percentages in Ontario and represents $190 more per student spent on teaching than the average.

The emphasis at Queen's has always been to place primary responsibility for efforts to improve the processes of teaching and learning upon the various Faculties, Schools and Departments at the level where the activities of teaching and learning are actually carried out. Over the years the various Faculties, Schools and Departments have promoted and financed experiments and programs to improve teaching effectiveness in ways that relate to their particular areas and needs.

In addition, the Senate Committee on Academic Development has discussed the subject from time to time and, on one occasion within the last two years, sponsored a special gathering at which projects and programs in a variety of Faculties were reported on to ensure University-wide awareness of the current range of activities. Our policy, then, has been to place initiative at the level where teaching and learning activities actually occur rather than to establish large or elaborate centralized offices or committees.

It was revealing to me that, in spite of proposals from Queen's for 1976-77 originally involving 15 projects costing $292,666, the letter which I received from OUPID stating that the decision whether to award a grant had been "deferred" to their next meeting, gave as the sole stated reason the fact that the proposed advisory co-ordinating committee at Queen's would be "too small."

In the meantime, because there is a range of projects awaiting to be implemented and because, early in the summer, we had already set aside from University trust funds, our own special fund of $30,000 for academic development for use during 1976-77, we have decided not to wait any longer while OUPID dithers over its decision. We are proceeding with our own proposals for assisting the various Faculties in their efforts to improve their teaching effectiveness.

On October 28th I announced in the Senate that a Principal's Advisory Committee on Teaching Effectiveness had been established. The chairman of the committee is Professor A.R.C. Duncan of the Department of Philosophy and the other members who have agreed to serve are Dr. A.M. Bryans (Department of Paediatrics), Mr. Morris Chochla (Law '78 and Education Commissioner of the AMS), Miss Cindi Hall (Arts '77), Professor G.F. Marsters (Department of Mechanical Engineering), Professor A. McGhie (Department of Psychology) and Professor A.H. Munby (Faculty of Education).

The terms of reference of the committee as I reported them to Senate are:

- (1) to consider and make recommendations to the appropriate standing bodies and officers within the University on ways in which the effectiveness of teaching and learning within the university might be improved,
- (2) to review proposals from Faculties, Schools, Departments and individuals for new or continuing projects for the improvement of teaching and learning and to recommend the allocation of funds established for that specific purpose by the University or obtained for that purpose from external sources,
- (3) to assist in obtaining additional external funds in support of projects for improvement of teaching and learning,
- (4) to report within a year to the Senate, through the Senate Committee on Academic Development, on an appropriate continuing structure for fostering effectiveness of teaching and learning within the University.

Is it a question of death or is it the prevention of life?

by Howard Smith

I can still hear the soul-piercing scream which shattered the silence of wards D8 and D9, Vancouver General Hospital during the summer of '69.

As unsettling as the anguished cries of death may be, they take on proportions vastly more disturbing when you know there are months yet to go. Mr. Bartlett had terminal cancer. A laparotomy (surgical investigation) revealed he was riddled with malignant secondaries. He was, without question, on the exit-ramp of life - why did he have to crawl his way out? For that whole summer his unrelenting cries of torment sent shivers up and down my spine; even as I left to go back to school he suffered on.

Two months later I talked to a nurse on D8 and D9. Yes, Mr. Bartlett had finally died, a mere six months of Hell later.

How many times I disputed Mr. Bartlett's demise with the internes on D8 and D9 I cannot say. "We have no right to help him out - and what's worse, if we did, we may be charged with manslaughter," so they said.

We live in a land of enlightenment by doses. Abortion laws now at least reflect the interest of the child-bearing mother in the question of her possible responsibilities. The Government of Canada has officially declined to sanction public vengeance in the character of capital punishment. These issues involve the question of death, or at least the prevention of life. Our liberal attitudes have not, however, illuminated the corridors of that death row which still exists - the hospital ward. The sentence imposed, "to be tormented in ineffable anguish until death," goes unmitigated by a Governor-General's reprieve. The dying man I described was only one of many who literally begged and implored every living soul in sight to put him out of his misery. Humanity in its wisdom, recognizing that to kill is evil (consider Auschwitz, Dachau, Vietnam, the gallows, gas chamber and the electric chair) has resisted the temptation to assist a man to step out of life with a shroud of dignity intact, otherwise soon to be robbed by excruciating, intractable and impossible pain.

That man accords with the one type of killing and disagrees with another, characterizes most western attitudes about death. A person might say war is good, as is capital punishment. Murder, abortion and euthanasia (mercy killing) may be simultaneously held out as social evils.

In some contexts, causing human death is applauded, yet in different circumstances it is not. Other people would disagree with capital punishment, war and murder yet approve abortion and euthanasia. In any case, the circumstances predict the results - killing is only "bad" in certain contexts. Given this recognition, why can we not distinguish between the prolongation of life and the prolongation of death?

The law of this land speaks not to euthanasia, yet the physicians of Canada confront the problem daily. One might wonder why, if euthanasia is such a burning issue, there is no clamour in Parliament to formulate the needed laws. The answer is simple - the dying, the dead and the bereaved are unlikely advocates. The blame should be levelled at the Medical Profession, for they, excepting the foregoing classes, are the most implicated parties - why have they not raised a hue and cry?

Without doubt a law to sanction death with dignity in the face of imminent torture would need to be one framed with exceptional care to prevent abuse. Nevertheless, the fact that human lives are at stake has yet to deter our lawmakers, and nor should it now. The time is nigh.

Peripheral Visions

by David Gay

The Final Solution

Over the past few years our University has been plagued by a problem. The problem is not unique to Queen's, in fact it is a problem common to almost all organisms above the amoeba, simple or compound. The problem is a lack of money.

Over the last decade, Queen's and other universities have wilted under government pressure and turned themselves into career oriented training centres, forcing Erasmus and

Van Gogh into the rumble seat for the time being. But the government has not supplied enough money for this change and so the search is on for funds which will allow Queen's to maintain its high standard of technical guidance.

The attempted solutions have been many and varied. Recall that last year, vector probability and five percent significance levels flew out the window as a group of Chemistry professors purchased an Olympic lottery ticket in the name of the university. Later, a band of overgrown, middle-aged, pipe-smoking Ph.D.'s disguised as Cub Scouts held a bottle drive as far up Montreal Street as possible. Noble, but mere candles in the wind compared to my 'final solution.'

This final solution occurred to me, I mean my friend Dan, or my sister, (oh, alright, me) late one evening. I found myself saturated with knowledge after one half hour in the library and decided to go home to watch television. Like most college students, I prefer to have my thinking done for me and so I switched the channel from "John Kenneth Galbraith Speaks Out" hoping to find some police brutality or a "Beverly Hillsbillies" rerun. I searched in vain and had to settle for a religious special. As I was gravely concerned with Queen's financial crisis, my thinking was being done for me in more ways than one.

The title of the show was "God is an American" and was brought to me under the auspices of the Dental Roberts Foundation. Dental was joined on the show by his lovely son Nasal and their lovely wives Honey and Glitter Teeth. A special address was delivered by Granite Head Armstrong entitled "Charles Darwin; from russia with love." Somewhere in the midst of the miracle of praise in song and dance which then unfolded, I was informed that the telecast originated from the campus of Dental Roberts University in and around the sleepy town of Nirvana, Oklahoma. Holy Molar Batman! A Whole University! You don't squeeze the nickels for that out of no basement boarding house!

Suddenly it was all too clear. The financial salvation of Queen's University is simply to turn it into a Kentucky Fried Evangelical College. I admit it's drastic, but I assure you it would put the Queen's bank balance into logarithms.

The last changes would be minor. All biology professors will have to denounce Charles Darwin as a communist and the football team will have to learn to turn the other cheek. Ban Rich Firesides would be replaced by emotional testimonies delivered over hearty porridge sandwiches, on plain or brown bread. Next would come the rapid expansion of QTV, which would have to be capable of producing four, hour-long 'specials' per year. These would come complete with song and dance from the mushrooming Drama Department and a message from Ronald Watts, Canada's TV Pastor. To go along with this, the Vaghy String Quartet will have to start brushing up on some Tammy Wynette and Roy Clark.

Queen's would become a great evangelical melting pot losing some of its cosmopolitan flavor, and a gigantic new cathedral will have to be built to symbolize this melting pot ideal. A Campus building will have to be demolished to make way for the cathedral and a central location would be preferable (What? Say, the International Centre!)

These are a few fragmentary ideas, just enough to convince you of the soundness of my scheme. What is that you say? So far, I have only talked about spending money, not earning it! Then shall I remind you that if Queen's is to be truly born again, if its glorious ministry is to continue then you must send in your certified cash or credit prayer for support. Just write to:

Election night lunacy

by Jim Klein

On Tuesday afternoon, under the delusion that I would pay no attention to the election results, I couldn't have agreed more with the fellow student who stated that any station to cover Chinese politics that evening could easily slaughter its competition in the ratings game.

Equally naturally, my evening consisted of a bare-minimum amount of reading diluted by a deluge of electoral votes and ethereal 'parochial issues.' It was only a matter of time until the consistently overblown commentary started to get to me. I thought out loud "but there's really nothing happening here!", and prayed (dare I admit it?) that my mother never meets the cynic within me.

The roots of my despair went deeper than the narrowness of the choice facing the American public. The magic medium, despite its power to educate by direct experience, was covering - no, was staging - a non-event, replete with phrases like "When our computer determines the winner..."

All of which returned my thoughts to China. What if Chancellor et al were to cover, live from Shanghai, the "1976 Purge of the Gang of Four"? The cameras and satellites would deny no viewer a personal opinion as to whether a million or more assembled peasants were genuinely involved or merely responding to cue. In a very real political event, something would change very perceptibly before us.

Television has created a demand for "first-hand" experience of real and important events, a demand which makes a futile parody of Tuesday's coverage. Some have always preferred, say, dramatic events in Ulster to the pastoral scenery to the south - television has simply increased the number of drama-lovers.

Tuesday epitomized television's wasted potential to lay real and changing events bare, for us to learn as individuals while we learn (and hopefully progress) as a society.

I envisioned coverage of Dostoevski's fictional meeting between Jesus (God) and the Grand Inquisitor (a Father of the Church). Millions would watch as a passive idealist debated the merits of free will (faith?) over the order (progress?) espoused by a pragmatist whose desiccation no amount of makeup could hide. Could the columns and letters of this paper could more clearly state, the religious dilemma?

Many such thoughts are inspired by bland coverage of non-events. What should Canada think of a President-elect who has so much as admitted to knowing us as little more than a large pink area on his Rand McNally? I was dragged from my reverie of an overtly imperialist act (what this country needs is a good, unifying guerilla war) by assurances that Mondale is a Canadiana expert, having presumably picnicked a lot at Kakebeka Falls.

At three a.m. I was reassured by a telling piece of absurdity. In one of those states where they fry their eggs on the sidewalks, a candidate blew the election by shooting two burros in the campaign's late stages - his claims of self-delence failed to jive with eyewitness reports that the beasts were shot in the back.

I thought of Donald Kelly who fifteen months ago won fame as a full-time murder suspect and erstwhile kidnapper, joyrider and general fugitive. His tenure as Northern Ontario folk hero ended in a shootout capture that cost the life of an OPP police dog, and his popularity was buried with the dog (before a huge crowd).

When asked (inevitably) where he went wrong, the wounded criminal is thought to have replied "I don't know, but I wish to hell I hadn't shot the dog."

For the last week and a half I have been praying that Jimmy Carter would win the U.S. presidential election. It would appear that God has said yes to my prayers.

Before you gape in disbelief consider the alternative. The only reason one could possibly vote for Ford (considering you are intelligent), is that he is a tested product which presents no great danger. The main issue in the election was the economy. According to James Tobin, a noted Yale economist, the present level of unemployment is costing the U.S. $120 billion in real GNP growth per year.

Mr. Ford is a nice man but his running mate is not, nor is he any brighter than Ford. In a CBS News survey of 15,000 voters on election day, 10 per cent considered the vice-presidential candidate an important factor in their choice. A lop-sided majority of the 10 per cent voted Democratic. One thing Bob Dole has going for him is his audacity. At a businessman's luncheon, he was criticizing the tax reform advocated by Jimmy Carter. He said, according to CBC, "That means he is going to close your loopholes." If a Canadian politician said that, his political career would be at an end.

Another interesting statistic that

CBS News turned up was the vote distribution according to income. In the $20,000 and higher income bracket, Ford beat Carter 2-1. In the $8,000 and lower income bracket, Carter beat Ford 2-1. In the $8,000 to $12,000 income bracket it was Carter by a shade and the candidates were dead even in the $12,000 to $20,000 income bracket.

A third factor in the election was the black vote. In Pennsylvania, for example, 91 per cent of the blacks voted for Carter. In the "Cotton" South, Carter lost the white vote by a 55-45 per cent margin and still managed to carry 55 per cent of the entire South vote.

I think the major factor in the election was one which none of the pundits mentioned; that was the half hour advertisement each candidate had on TV on Monday night. Americans like to believe that their politicians are people just like themselves. On Monday night, Carter had film clips of normal Americans asking him questions, which he answered one at a time. Ford's half-hour was composed of a promotion clip saying what a great guy Ford was, and a few words from the candidate. If American politicians are "just folks" then they must be approachable. On Monday night, Carter clearly was and Ford clearly was not.

Susie-Q; for and against....

Dear Editor:

In the October 25th edition of the Journal, there was an article concerning the Women's Centre's opposition to Susie Q Week. As a member of the committee opposing Susie Q Week at the Women's Centre, I feel our position was inadequately expressed.

In the aforementioned article, the Women's Centre's position, i.e. that Susie Q Week is "demoralizing, degrading and sexist," was passed off as a mere cliché without substance or meaning. This does a great injustice to the quality of our opposition. The very name, Susie Q, evokes the image of a cute, brainless little girl, all blushes and curls - an image which most Queen's women haven't lived up to since they were six years old. Such an image is an insult to an intelligent, self-respecting female (above the age of six.)

Our opposition to Susie Q Week is that it carries the connotation that only one week out of fifty-two are Queen's women granted the privilege of social equality. If the point of Susie Q Week was to encourage women to exercise this equality (which is theirs by rights), and thereby make it easier to do so the rest of the year, this objection would not arise. Perhaps, indeed, this was the original intent of the Week. However, if this was the case, this purpose has been severely subverted. This year's slogan, "Girls, go out and get your man!" only succeeds in perpetuating the myth that women seek to trap men. Even if Susie Q Week is not meant to "evaluate or criticize the woman's position in male-female relationships" (as Ms. Symons says,) it is still a sad comment on the state of those relationships.

We should like to emphasize that we are not in any way against Susie Q Week as a social week. We do object, however, to the aspersions it casts, in its present state, on the dignity of womanhood. If the purposes of the Week could be rehabilitated to become a statement of woman's new-found social freedom in society instead of implying her continued servitude, the only problem would be the name, which could easily be changed. We certainly hope that this is also the opinion of more than "5 percent" of the University community. If not, it bodes ill for the future of mature female-male relationships.

Nancy Lee Taylor

Ed. Note: The slogan for this year's Susie Q Week is "Start something that will last all year."

Dear Editor:

Susie Q Week shows quite explicitly that reversing the male-female roles does not represent equality. Reversing the power structure does not get rid of it.

Liberation can only be achieved by first recognizing the oppressive structure of our social relationships. Allowing women the right for one week to invite men out reinforces the existing structures while at the same time adding more anxieties. Many first-year women probably feel that this week in November is the only time that they can openly approach men without being hassled. Instead of encouraging women to act on their own, this week enslaves them even more.

The activities of this so called 'liberating' week seem rather contradictory. Pubs, dances and games all encourage couples and dates. This is by no means a path towards liberated individuals. People should be able to interact in any number, not only in twos as in the Ark.

Then why does Susie Q (granddaughter of Sadie Hawkins no doubt) exist? Here we see two probable answers. As long as a special week is put aside spotlighting behavior in women that is traditionally "masculine," it will not be seen as the norm, thereby stigmatizing any women who are assertive during the other 51 weeks of the year. Susie Q Week does not even offer women the possibility of competing in a man's world but reinforces her passive role.

This week is a reactionary, sexist concept. Instead of participating in the activities organized for Susie Q Week, let's use this time to get to know our sisters. Invite a sister to coffee.

Gale Blanc

Dear Editor:

In view of the controversy recently arising over the 'sexist' origins of Susie Q Week, my committee would like to clarify the meaning and purpose of Susie Q Week.

Because of the social attitudes prevalent in society today, Susie Q Week is not an outlet for women to exercise a formally male role - that of asking for a date. Twenty years ago dating was a strictly male prerogative.

The theme this year, "Start Something That Will Last All Year" is not intended to have sexual connotations, but to encourage a spirit of fun, friendship and activity that will last well beyond Susie Q Week.

Susie Q Week, therefore, is not intended to comment on male-female roles but to serve as a social stimulus to surmount initial shyness experienced by all. It serves as a theme for social and cultural events, giving various faculties and years the chance to sponsor an event and raise some revenue for their group.

Susie Q Week is a tradition at Queen's just like Homecoming and invariably one of the most successful and well liked events all year. We hope this year's effort will be just as successful, and we look forward to an enjoyable week and year.

Ariadne Symons and the Susie Q Committee

Dear Editor:

Many people seem to be getting the impression that the Queen's Women's Centre is violently opposed to "Susie Q Week". There is little or no reason for this impression.

The Queen's Women's Centre would be in favour of such a week if we felt that its purpose was to awaken both women and men to the fact that socializing, of any kind, can be much more pleasant if we allow ourselves to freely share the initiative in social situations, rather than remain paralyzed within rigidly defined sexual roles. It seems, however, that "Susie Q Week" is the one week of the year when the roles are reversed; consequently, it is assumed that these roles should remain unaltered during the other fifty-one weeks of the year. If this attitude is truly reflected in Susie

Q Week then the Queen's Women's Centre want to put an end to this week of festivities. Nothing could be further from the truth. We welcome anything which gives people the opportunity to communicate freely and happily.

Since I am a man who is happy to deal with women who are trying to be free and are willing to help me to free myself from the limitations of the traditional male role, I hope that men will not defend this role by mocking the way that it is played by women, but rather that both men and women will be able to see the ridiculousness of these roles when they are arbitrarily switched.

Susie Q Week should not be an excuse to mock each other, but an opportunity to laugh at ourselves. Doug Heasman

Poverty and Independence

Your statement that "the blacks of the Transkei are glad to have achieved freedom from the apartheid system of South Africa but as yet are unsure exactly what to do with their freedom", is perhaps the most ridiculous statement ever to be printed in your ridiculous Journal. It shows an understanding of the apartheid system of South Africa roughly equivalent to that of a two-year-old in Papua, New Guinea.

The main weakness in the statement, to put it politely, is that the so-called 'independence' of the Transkei is not designed to free the Transkei from apartheid, as you so perceptively suggest, but rather it is an integral part of apartheid. In fact it is part of the policy of apartheid (since 1958, euphemistically called 'separate development') eventually to grant a quasi-'independence' to all nine of the Bantu 'homelands'.

But as everybody in the world except your Journal and perhaps the South African government can see, what South Africa means by independence is not what others mean by independence. (Though, to complicate matters further, others often use independence in a very strange way; viz. Latin America for example). To understand this, one has to understand the workings of separate development, which is so complex I can only give a general impression here.

'Separate development' is a policy designed, quite clearly, to make the system of white rule in South Africa more elaborate, more sophisticated and more efficient. It is a system whereby the Blacks in the reserves are not 'developed' but in fact made poorer, in order to compel the males to work in the 'white areas'. (The Blacks, comprising 70 per cent of the population of South Africa were given 12.5 per cent of the land. Almost all of it is now acutely impoverished, over-eroded, overpopulated, over-stocked and overgrazed.)

It is a system whereby these Blacks in the 'white-areas' are stripped of all rights, while the Blacks in the reserves are given certain political rights ('independence') in return for the continuation of complete economic dependence. It is a system, moreover, whereby tribal customs are artificially maintained in the reserves in order to act as a cushion against impoverishment (because of tribal communal practices). This is in order to ensure the reproduction and control of the cheap Black labour force (because of the aforementioned 'cushion' against 'impoverishment' and because of tribal laws) and finally, in order to ensure the continuation of the migrant labour system (because the artificially maintained system of communal land tenure in the reserves inhibits the development of individual land tenure and hence inhibits the development of self-sufficient farmers who would not want to work in the 'white areas'). Thus on the whole, it is a system not of 'separate development' but of white domination.

Chief Matanzima, the new ruler of the Transkei, was a nonentity, (a small village chief) until he was discovered by the White Government as a Black who was prepared, in return for substantial rewards, to support 'separate development'. The Transkeian Government which voted for 'independence' comprised 63 'chiefs' appointed by the Whites, and 45 elected members. In the referendum on independence, 42 percent of Transkeians voted and 54 percent were in favor. None of those who voted were aware of the implication of independence. In 1974, a 'Security Bill' was passed in South Africa which granted power to the Bantu Governments, the Transkei included, to take action against all forms of organization in the reserves, and to restrict freedom of movement and freedom of the press.

It should be clear from all this that the people of the Transkei have no effective 'independence' and no freedom at all. The granting of 'independence' to the Transkei is designed entirely to maintain its dependence on white South Africa, and it is nothing, absolutely nothing more than a piece of window-dressing for the outside world and a none-too-subtle attempt at co-optation of the Blacks.

Fortunately most of the outside world, and most of the Blacks have been able to see this. You, rather indicatively, are an exception. I suggest that either your staff learns something about world politics or you drop them. Better still, you could drop that farcically small section on world and local news on the back page and leave such news to the experts, wherever they are.

The true worth of a university

Dear Editor:

Attending the Convocation ceremony held Saturday afternoon we were impressed by the awarding of a Bachelor of Arts degree to a particular graduate.

Mary Pauline Vipond Platt, a resident of Kingston, completed her long term study in the discipline of Religion Mrs. Platt as a graduate is unique in that she is a great-grandmother. She began her degree by correspondence, and during the last two years attended summer school and evening classes.

The moment Mrs. Platt was conferred the degree by Chancellor Michener the convocation broke into applause. Her dedication toward educational endeavours was recognized by everyone present.

It was a stirring moment for us, the onlookers who currently are in the midst of the educational experience. It is refreshing, indeed, to witness an instance where an individual pursues knowledge for its own sake, that, as a source of personal fulfillment Mrs. Platt, as a student, exemplifies the true worth of the university education and is the source of inspiration to those students who do not regard the university as merely a stepping stone to a profession.

Expand Parking?

Dear Editor:

This letter protests the expansion of the parking lot behind Dupuis Hall that is bordered by Barrie and Clergy Streets. There are two reasons behind my protest.

The first is simple. I doubt that the expansion is necessary unless a great increase in the number of cars on Campus is anticipated. For four years I have walked through the lot to and from school and I have yet to see it full. Only one event succeeds in coming close to filling it - the annual Spring Convocation. During the normal working day it is about three quarters full and at night and over the weekends it is practically empty.

As far as I know the underground parking lot south of Kingston Hall is operating at less than capacity. This is the best facility for parking on Campus and was constructed at considerable expense to the Ontario taxpayer. Every attempt to fill the underground lot should be made and no new parking facilities should be considered until it approaches capacity use. These two examples beg the question, if there is parking space available on Campus, why is the Barry Street lot being expanded?

The second reason I have is slightly more abstract, but recognizes probable future shifts and trends in our society away from conventional automobile use to more efficient modes of transportation; for example, rapid mass transit. There is little doubt that such trends are now apparent and will continue to develop.

The University, I believe has an obligation to foster and assist the development of ideals that are considered beneficial to our society now, and those that will be considered valuable in the future. One of the most obvious of these ideals is the reduction of our overuse-abuse of a method of transportation that while being comfortable and expedient is, probably unequaled throughout history for its inefficiency and gross wastefulness of natural and manufactured resources. The construction of additional parking space, thereby making it even easier to drive a car to and from Queen's is typical of the myopic, expediency-based planning that makes tradition so difficult to change today.

If the parking is to be expanded I would ask for one concession from the planners. If at all possible, even if it means - God forbid - parking cars at weird angles, leave the trees standing. Parking lots are gross at best, but trees can help the general picture. If the trees are not left, I can only speculate that the planners have missed the boat on what is the best way to use University land.

Sincerely,
Colin McIver

Sidewalk acts as noticeboard

Pray for winter

I would like to draw your readers' attention to the fresh red paint in front of the Douglas Library done by the socialists of our University. It is not my intention to injure the socialists in any way, I only use this crest as an example.

Queen's has traditionally been a competitive university, with inter-year rivalry being especially strong. Crest painting has become a respected tradition which has evolved out of this rivalry. Indeed, our ubiquitous grey sidewalks are enhanced by this constructive embellishment. However I am sorry to see that this practice is becoming bastardized by political groups who decide to smear their ideas on our sidewalk. If this behaviour is allowed to continue, our sidewalks will be reduced to sharing a place with barricades and boardwalks acting as public notice boards!

Fortunately all will soon be covered by snow and ice and we can start afresh next year using discretion and tradition as our guidelines.

NUCLEAR THREAT

Can we afford to play the nuclear arms game?

Taming a nuclear giant

by Ashley Hilliard

The proliferation of nuclear weapons around the world is not the burning public issue it should be despite an important recent debate in the House of Commons (March 23, 1976). We have all learned to live with the bomb and we leave the rest to the experts. This complacent attitude ignores the very real danger we now face. Not just a few "responsible" nations will have the bomb but many smaller countries, some engaged in local confrontations, will soon have the material from which to fashion their own nuclear weapons, aided perhaps by Canadian nuclear exports.

In a talk on October 20th sponsored by the Faculty of Law and the Centre for International Relations, William Epstein, long-time Director of Disarmament Division of the United Nations Secretariat, professor at the University of Victoria and author of The Last Chance: Nuclear Proliferation and Arms Control reminded an audience of about fifty of the dangers. What follows are some personal thoughts sparked by this talk.

Professor Epstein catalogued the failure of the international community to control the spread of nuclear arms. Test ban treaties, the International Atomic Energy Agency, SALT talks, even the highly touted Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, have had only a limited effect. Six countries are known to have nuclear weapons (if one includes India with her "peaceful nuclear explosion"), and many more have potential. In fact, as Professor Epstein pointed out, the technical knowledge required to make a bomb is openly available in the literature, so that, given the fuel and an investment of a mere $1 to $3 million, any country (or group of persons) can create a nuclear weapon.

In light of this, the focus of concern of those hoping to restrain the proliferation of nuclear weapons has shifted from attempts to stop the spread of nuclear "know-how" towards two other objectives, (1) persuading presently "non-nuclear" states to remain so, and (2) controlling the availability of the raw material for making bombs, i.e. plutonium and the fissionable isotope of uranium, U-235.

To attain the first objective will require international diplomacy and statesmanship of the highest order. The key here, as Professor Epstein pointed out, is to change the circumstances which prompt nuclear countries to go nuclear, as far as this is possible, and in the main this means relaxing tensions and eliminating perceived threats among the nations of the world. The nuclear powers must lead the way here. Among other measures, they must first limit and then quickly decrease the size of their own arsenals, renounce the use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear states and agree to ban all nuclear test explosions, atmospheric and subterranean. In short, they must act selflessly, rationally and responsibly. No student of history or observer of our present troubled world will, it seems to me, set his hopes by this faint star. Not, to her credit, being a nuclear power herself, Canada's role in this area can only be as a supporter rather than as an active leader.

At first sight the second objective appears more promising. Though, given the material, making a bomb is not difficult these days, it costs a great deal to enrich natural uranium to the state in which it can be used in nuclear reactors and then, after use, to reprocess the spent fuel in "reprocessing plants" so that it can be used again. By controlling, through contractual safeguards and obligations, the fuel used in nuclear reactors and, above all, by restricting the number of reprocessing plants around the world, the nuclear reactor supplier countries, of which Canada is one, could greatly reduce the risk of the spread of nuclear weapons. Such measures would also, incidentally, do something to localize, if not solve, the great unsolved environmental problem of the disposal of nuclear wastes as these, as I understand it, are mainly a by-product of the reprocessing plants. Such measures seem to be plain common sense.

The truth is that if we are serious about stopping nuclear proliferation, we must rethink our reliance on nuclear energy as the prime source of energy for the future. We cannot, ethically, go full steam ahead with nuclear reactors in Canada and yet refuse to share our technology with the world. But it seems that we cannot share our technology without contributing, wittingly or unwittingly, to the spread of nuclear weapons. It is no answer to say that if we do not sell nuclear technology to the world others will do so. This is the excuse of scoundrels. The only consistent and ethical position, then, is for us to re-examine our entire nuclear policy. Instead of pouring millions, even billions over the next years, into building nuclear reactors, we should be investing these sums in the use of renewable energy sources, such as geothermal power, the sun, the wind. In some cases the technology needed to harness these sources efficiently is already developed or is on the brink of being developed. These sources convert more efficiently into electrical power than does nuclear energy. Government funding for research and the development of mass production techniques, and if necessary, even direct subsidies to industry and individuals to help pay for the installation of solar panels, would do wonders. At present our record in this area is abysmal. For example, only 3 percent of the federal government's research and development budget is devoted to renewable energy, while 70 percent is spent on the Canadian nuclear program alone.

Why is this so? There are undoubtedly a number of reasons, but one of the major ones must be the momentum that nuclear energy has gained over the past twenty or so years. Stopping this momentum, which is taking us headlong into a fully nuclear future, requires countering the power of what might be called the "government-industrial nuclear complex." This complex is composed of the large uranium mining companies (some of them subsidiaries of large and powerful international corporations), the nuclear technology companies, the provincial utilities (notably Ontario Hydro) and the federal bureaucracy which regulates the industry and sells Canadian reactors and uranium overseas (the uranium section of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Atomic Energy Control Board, the various Crown corporations.) Of this vested interest group, the hardest to budge may well be the federal bureaucracy, after all, the jobs of all these civil servants depend on there being a large nuclear industry to run.

Switching away from nuclear energy would have many other benefits besides the one I have been concerned with here, Canada's role in reducing the spread of nuclear weapons. It would be beneficial from an environmental point of view; it would create jobs where they are needed in local industries and construction; it would diffuse control in the energy field away from the large companies and big government to the individual homeowner or company. Coupled with energy conservation measures, there is evidence that it can meet our future energy needs (see Energy Probe's Renewable Energy Handbook available free from 43 Queen's Park Crescent, Toronto M5S 2C3.) And, by developing and perhaps becoming a leader in renewable energy technology, Canada could eventually do more to solve the energy problem facing the world than it could by peddling hundreds of CANDU reactors. For the "third" and "fourth" worlds in particular, nuclear technology is totally inappropriate, capital intensive, extremely complicated and requiring highly trained personnel to operate and repair; renewable energy technology would be far more appropriate: small is beautiful.

A major issue in the recent Swedish election was the future of nuclear energy in that country. The voters chose in favour of re-examining the Swedish nuclear programme. We would be well advised to re-examine ours

Nuclear power has been presented as an answer to all the problems of a world worried about future supplies of energy. Proponents claim that it is cheaper than fossil fuels, and cleaner. It appears that all that has to be done is to build so many nuclear reactors and all our problems will be solved.

Recently, however, serious questions have been raised about committing Canada to a nuclear future.

Let us, for the purpose of this article, assume that all the technical problems associated with nuclear power can be solved. Even if this assumption is made, will nuclear energy be the solution to all our future energy and economic problems or will it cause more problems than it will solve?

Perhaps the most obvious problem is the huge capital cost of building nuclear reactors. Nuclear power is 50 to 100 times as capital-intensive as fossil fuels.

The high capital cost will have a significant effect on the economic system. Take the United States' ten-year energy program as an example. Predictions show that over the ten years, the U.S. will require three-quarters of all net private domestic investment. It now has one-quarter. Although no such figures are available for Canada, our situation is probably the same.

This would effectively commit Canada to a nuclear power program. No money would be available to develop new energy technologies which might be less capital-intensive. Qualified people who might otherwise be working on other forms of power will tend to be attracted to the form of energy receiving the most monetary support.

Can we take this risk? The effects of nuclear power as a major energy source cannot be predicted until after such a policy has been implemented.

The greater part of the money to build nuclear reactors comes from private investors buying bonds and debentures. The high proportion of money needed from the private sector would require a strong central authority to direct money towards nuclear reactor construction. Money would have to be diverted from other concerns, such as hospitals, private industry, schools, etc. A severe strain on the economy would result. A more authoritarian society would probably develop to make people give up some things in order to enable money to go to nuclear energy.

In poor countries, the high capital cost would probably switching to nuclear power on a large scale. If poor countries can't afford nuclear power, it will increase the already huge gap between poor and developed countries. Moreover, electricity, the end form of nuclear energy, is not readily adaptable for use by poorer countries. The people would have to buy equipment to use the nuclear power. This would increase the capital cost. Also, recent experience with modern technology in poor countries shows that the technology is too complex.

Apart from this, there is the danger that countries buying nuclear reactors can use the technology gained to make atomic bombs. India did this, using plutonium refined from the waste products of a Canadian reactor. This happened despite safeguards against this very thing. With atomic weapons proliferation, the risk of a nuclear war greatly increases.

The greater the number of nuclear reactors, the easier it is for the terrorist group to obtain enough material to make an atomic bomb. Apparently atom bombs are easy to design. People at the undergraduate level have designed bombs which they claim will work.

Nuclear power is also energy-intensive. Dr. Morton Chapman, a British scientist, has predicted that the rapid proliferation of nuclear reactors will worsen the energy crisis rather than relieve it. Fossil fuel will be redirected from other uses to build reactors. It could be argued that after a period of temporary inconvenience, there would be enough energy for all. This would all be in the form of electricity, unless synthetic fuels can be made.

Synthetic fuel is actually a big factor in favour of nuclear power. If it can be made, most of our engines, which rely on fuel, can still be used. We will not need a massive change of all engines to electrical power. Figures show that currently only 5-10 percent of our power needs must actually use electricity. This takes into account computers, telecommunications, smelting, and others. The rest of our electrical use is for heat. However, even if synthetic fuel can be made fairly cheaply, it would still require nuclear power to produce, and consequently all that goes with nuclear power.

Energy conservation is a big must, whether you are pro or anti-nuclear. If we increase the efficiency of energy use by two percent we would save more energy by the year 2000 than nuclear power could produce. This would give at least twenty-five years to develop new sources of energy. There is no reason why nuclear power could not be part of the solution. Ruling it out altogether would be a big mistake.

The major assumption in making energy policy is that of a continually increasing demand for energy. While this will probably be true for the near future, it could change 20 or 30 years from now. Also, nuclear energy, like coal and oil, is ultimately finite. When the supply of fissionable material runs out, new energy sources will have to be found. Nuclear power merely delays the problem, it does not solve it.

Even if the problems of the far future are ignored and we do succeed in completing the switch to nuclear power, there are still problems to face. A few central sources of power, the reactors, will distribute energy through a grid of power lines to many points. This is particularly vulnerable to acts of malice. At this time, everything would be run by electricity, including such things as cars, tractors and trains. If the source of electricity was destroyed, it would be a major disaster.

The controls needed to prevent this would lead to a repressive society. The controls would also be needed to keep the future society unchanged for the length of time needed to keep watch over radioactive wastes. This is about 1,000 years. This legacy will be around whether our descendants want to use nuclear energy or not.

The very complexity of nuclear technology could lead the few who understand it to positions of power, perhaps creating a technical elite. Alvin Weinberg, a nuclear physicist in the United States, has already advocated a "nuclear scientific priesthood" to safeguard people from the dangers of the peaceful atom. There is no guarantee that such a "priesthood," even if started with the best of intentions, would act in the best interests of all people. There is a danger that such an elite could lose touch with the consumer.

Present plans for nuclear expansion call for 112 reactors in Canada by the year 2000. Where will Presumably the other developed countries will be busy building reactors of their own.

This leads to another problem. There is only a finite amount of fuel for all users. This limits the total number of reactors that can be built. The numbers that can be built can be increased by using breeder reactors.

Even if this is done, it only increases the lifetime of reactors. It does not extend them indefinitely. Also, large amounts of money will have to be spent on refineries to separate waste from reusable fuel. This will increase the already high capital costs.

Unfortunately, a topic as complex as nuclear energy can't be adequately covered in the short treatment given here. Much of what has been predicted is a result of trying to extrapolate from our present society to the future, a chancy process at best. The fact is that not enough is known about the social and long-term economic effects of nuclear power to enable anyone to state, whether nuclear energy should be an energy priority or not.

More facts are needed in order to make a decision. What is needed even more is public awareness of the problems associated with nuclear power. The people should be more involved in the decision-making process. We should not let ourselves be committed to nuclear energy without at least an examination of the alternatives.

Toller Cranston

par S.E. Zimmermann

Il y a deux semaines du Kingston Memorial Centre on a présenté un spectacle formidable: Toller Cranston dans "The Ice Show". Finis les costumes risibles, finies les lignes de belles filles faisant un can-can, finies les annonces ennuyantes. Voici le patinage professionnel d'avenir. On nous a présenté treize patineurs excellents dans deux actes sans interruption, qui se sont composés d'une trentaine de petites scènes basées sur toutes sortes de musiques: chansons populaires, marches, musique classique. Les patineurs interprètent la musique comme ils le veulent; comme ils le faisaient autrefois après les épreuves de compétitions. Le but, selon Toller Cranston, c'est l'excellence.

Cette excellence est apparue chez tous les artistes. Berezowski et Porter, anciens champions canadiens, par exemple, ont essayé de nous convaincre que ce n'est rien de danser sur les patins. Quant à Millns et D'Connor, leur technique était bonne, mais ils manquaient un certain élan surtout dans le numéro de "Rhapsody in Blue" qui a duré trop longtemps. L'équipe de Fraser et Jones a passionné les spectateurs non seulement par leur fluidité et les sauts faits avec perfection, mais aussi par quelques mouvements nouveaux et effrayants, mais qui ne les empêchent pas de les faire avec assurance et brillante.

C'était une surprise agréable de voir Gordon McKellen, Jr., qui a sans doute été une des étoiles de ce spectacle; sa popularité était secondaire seulement à celle de Cranston. Par contraste avec la beauté des couples, la simplicité des femmes, et les passions agonisantes que subit Cranston, McKellen nous offre un peu de comique ainsi qu'une technique parfaite. Il sait faire rire les spectateurs avec les mimes et les gestes exagérés. Son interprétation de "Bumpy Bump" était excellente.

Toller Cranston était sans doute l'étoile du spectacle. Portant des costumes noirs et étincelants, il nous a présenté le vrai Toller, sans les contraintes des compétitions. Depuis longtemps il voulait faire ce spectacle, il le considère comme le seul véhicule possible pour lui-même comme patineur professionnel. Quand il patine, la musique et l'artiste se confondent et deviennent une entité. C'est une expérience visuelle, auditive et émotionnelle, pour lui et pour les spectateurs; on ne peut qu'éprouver la joie ou la tristesse qu'il exprime. C'est presque impossible d'en parler sans utiliser les superlatifs. Même quand il est tombé, il en a fait un moment dramatique. Mais ses performances étaient presque sans fautes et d'une beauté et d'une intensité qu'on ne peut que louer.

M. Cranston a dit dans un interview que l'année prochaine le spectacle aura plus de continuité dont le manque semblait être le seul problème maintenant), et il sera beaucoup plus théâtral. La troisième saison on envisageait de faire un musical et de présenter à Broadway. Pour Cranston c'est la seule voie possible pour le patinage professionnel. Déjà on a une tentative à une petite histoire dans un scénario intitulé "The Bolt", assez bien fait mais d'une trop courte durée. M. Cranston veut qu'on prenne non seulement lui mais tout le monde du patinage au sérieux.

Il y avait deux choses, selon M. Cranston, qui empêchaient les spectateurs de Kingston de vraiment "assister" au spectacle. D'abord on n'a pas pu monter les lumières spéciales pour ce spectacle et donc non seulement les spectateurs étaient aveuglés, mais aussi les patineurs. Autour de la patinoire, il y a une vitre protectrice qui fonctionnait comme une "barrière", empêchant "l'électricité" de couler entre les artistes et les spectateurs. Malgré ces fautes, "l'électricité" était là: les ovations chaque soir en sont la preuve.

C'était une soirée formidable: non seulement a-t-on vu de l'excellence, mais aussi on est conscient d'avoir assisté à un commencement. C'était le nouveau patinage en germe. On doit crier Bravo et puis se mettre à attendre avec impatience les années qui viennent.

Beau Dommage

Contrairement aux rumeurs qui circulent, le groupe Beau Dommage ne s'est pas séparé. Pourtant il y a eu du changement. Robert Léger -- qui jouait de la flûte, de la basse et qu'on retrouvait aussi aux différents claviers, en plus d'aider à la composition des chansons -- ne lera dorénavant plus partie du groupe.

Léger a en effet décidé de ne plus être musicien comme tel, c'est à dire qu'il ne participera pas plus aux spectacles de même qu'à l'enregistrement des disques. Il demeure toutefois membre de la "cooperative" et continuera à composer pour le groupe. Léger sera donc remplacé par Michel Hudon autrefois du "Grand cirque ordinaire."

Lévesque

Le parti québécois aura enfin, affirme René Lévesque, sa première chance de livrer une lutte d'égal à égal avec le parti libéral du Québec pour l'obtention du pouvoir aux prochaines élections générales. M. Lévesque a en effet maintenu que les chances du P.Q. de prendre le pouvoir sont sérieusement avantagées par la démission de ses opposants: 1. L'U.N., le P.C. et le P.N.P. qui n'ont plus l'influence de jadis sur le peuple électoral. Il ajouta par ailleurs que son parti a grandement bénéficié de sa position d'opposition officielle à l'Assemblée Nationale. De plus, le chef péquiste croit que le peuple québécois sera en mesure, six ans après avoir élu les libéraux, de porter un jugement (sévére, dit-il) sur l'administration du gouvernement Bourassa. Ayant déjà déclenché sa campagne électorale, M. Lévesque visite présentement différents coins de la province.

M. Mounin à Queen's

le 26 octobre, le département de français, ici à Queen's, a reçu la visite de M. Mounin, professeur de Linguistique Générale à l'université d'Aix-en-Provence, et visiteur à l'université de Montréal jusqu'à la fin du mois. M. Mounin a fait ses études en littérature italienne puis s'est aventuré dans le domaine de la pédagogie et de l'enseignement. Mais, comme les étudiants ont pu le remarquer, son intérêt ne s'est pas arrêté à l'enseignement. Le domaine de la traduction puis de la linguistique l'ont attiré.

Les étudiants sous-gradués ont été en mesure d'assister à une conférence l'avant-midi, avec M. Mounin. Le sujet de son exposé a été l'explication de texte du "Couvre-lieu", un poème de Paul Eluard, poète français surréaliste, de notre siècle. Sa façon très vivante et énergique "d'attaquer" le texte a enthousiasmé les étudiants. L'explication du poème de huit vers, d'apparence très simple, a divulgué tout un trésor de renseignements sur la vie du poète et sur la période durant la 2e guerre mondiale, lorsque la France fut occupée par les allemands. D'après M. Mounin, la forme est le moyen, et le contenu la fin. M. Mounin a réussi à montrer aux étudiants l'importance, et surtout l'intérêt que peut avoir l'explication de texte.

Au cours de la conférence de l'après-midi, les élèves gradués ont rencontré M. Mounin, linguiste. Il a parlé du prédicat dans la syntaxe française et des théories qui essaient de définir le prédicat. A partir de la théorie logique d'Aristote, la théorie grammaticale de Bally, la théorie psychologique aussi de Bally et Wundt, et finalement la théorie linguistique de Martinet, M. Mounin a montré quel genre de problème font face les linguistes intéressés au prédicat. Encore une fois, la vitalité du conférencier s'est communiquée aux élèves et aux professeurs présents. Conclusion: c'est un domaine qui inquiète. Et, jusqu'à ce que cette inquiétude dans les théories disparaisse, d'après M. Mounin, on n'a pas trouvé la théorie par excellence qui donnerait la définition du prédicat. Toutes les théories étudiées ne semblent pas parvenir à expliquer parfaitement le cas du prédicat dans la syntaxe française.

Finalement, pour les intéressés, M. Mounin est un de ces professeurs, qui, bien qu'ils aient terminé leurs "études" comme telles, se rendent compte qu'ils n'ont jamais fini d'apprendre. Il a commencé sa carrière en linguistique assez tard dans sa vie, mais cela ne l'a pas empêché de contribuer plusieurs œuvres très importantes, soient: Les belles infidèles [1955], Poésie et société [1962], Les problèmes théoriques de la traduction [1963], La Communication poétique [1969], Introduction à la sémiologie [1970], Linguistique et Philosophie [1975]. M. Mounin semble être très à l'aise dans le domaine de la poétique, de la traduction et de la linguistique aussi bien que dans l'enseignement, et ça se voit dans l'énergie qu'il a démontré durant ses deux séances à Queen's.

Avis aux intéressés: le 16 novembre, le département de français recevra M. Claude Duchet, expert en socio-critique. Il y aura une séance le matin et une l'après-midi. Pour plus de renseignements, entrez en communication avec le secrétariat du département de français.

Les Mâles

Réalisation et scénario: Gilles Carle

Images: René Verzie

Musique: Stéphanie Venne

Interprétation: Donald Pilon, René Blouin, Andrée Pelletier, Katherine Mousseau, Guy Le Ecuyer, Paul Gauthier

Deux hommes, un bûcheron de 34 ans et un Poète sculpteur de 10 ans son cadet ont quitté le monde, ses pompes et ses œuvres. Ils vivent en forêt comme des ermites depuis 553 jours... sans femmes.

A la vue des œuvres du plus jeunes des deux -- des seins et des fesses sculptés sur bois -- on comprend la hantise. Le bûcheron ne s'exprime pas sur bois, mais on sait rapidement qu'il n'est pas de bois. Leur sujet: la femme devient une véritable obsession.

C'est ainsi que "les mâles" quittent leur petit coin retiré de la forêt à la conquête d'une femme. Leurs aventures et mésaventures sont racontées dans le film de Gilles Carle, production qui a pris l'affiche à Ellis Hall le 22 octobre.

Des les premières images, Carle nous situe quant à ses intentions. Il veut traiter d'une obsession bien naturelle, dans des circonstances sur un ton léger allant de l'amusant à la lantaisie en passant par la satire et même quelques gags.

A ce point de vue, le film a un très bon départ, si non au fait, qu'il y a lieu de se demander si Carle pourra soutenir l'élan tout au long du film. A mi-chemin, on regrette de constater que le cinéaste manque de souffle et va jusqu'à s'égayer dans cette grande forêt sur celluloid avec ses sentiers qui mènent nulle part, ses sous-bois mystérieux et ses ruisseaux à sous-courants.

Gilles Carle fait une volte-face inexcusable au beau milieu du film. Après avoir traité de son sujet sur un bon ton, l'intrigue prend une tournure illogique. Plus tard, comme il s'est rendu compte que son coup de cinéma n'a pas réussi, il tente de s'amender avec des gags de "culs", mais en vain.

A la fin nos protagonistes sont encore à la recherche, à travers la femme, d'une fantaisie, d'une liberté, que cette planète garde jalousement comme secret. Donald Pilon (le bûcheron St. Pierre) et René Blouin (le poète) font très naturels comme interprètes.

Katherine Mousseau (infirmière), une beauté rousse à l'air dégagé et Andrée Pelletier (Rita), une beauté brune à l'air sombre, nous laissent voir plus de peau que de talent. Mais, il faut dire que la caméra de Carle contourne les corps pour leur beauté plastique et non dans le but de provoquer des sensations érotiques. Il y a avec discrétion et bon sens.

C'est un long métrage que tout cinéophile ne devrait pas manquer dans l'avenir.

On receiving a proposal of marriage in jest

by Mary Simonsen

Hi sweetheart!
Wath'ya doing for the rest of your life?
(good question)
Let's get married tonight or next week.
And we laughed
about engraved invitations
as though we were really going to send them.
I wonder what I'd do if someday someone asked me the same question without knowing it was the same joke.
Cynical as hell,
I think I might say yes.

i was going to type you a love poem

by Ziuta

the rain how should i say falls with the rhythm of what weaving silence in my head stuffed up with a cold and how i say i feel alone i am alone i searched Bank Street and bought a new ribbon for the typewriter to type you a love poem and a fine dictionary of the antonym and synonym i could not find the train of metaphors in any dime store, wow!
how i love you how should i say i was going to write you a love poem as good and as true and as beautiful as you but let me not begin to count the ways of joy for lest i propane our love tongue-tied at Canada stats for like the worn out ribbon your absence fades me yet when you are here my new ribbon warms up that old love machine still rather whisper you a love

The winds of time are more persuasive than the tear-drops
that fall from the up-stairs

The bullets mingle with the sea silent and soon forgotten

But like the triumphant Cloth Leaf the flutters
as a young heart
not yet in rags, barefoot in the polluted puddle of truth i stumble

And fall into your arms
I think we will make it after all.

I would like to woo and win
A lady of high beauty and pious repute
Unfortunately for my daydreams
there are no longer dragons to slay and princesses are rarely locked in an ivory tower

National Student's DayA voice against rising costsby Dan Keeton
Canadian University Press

"November 9 is National Student Day" is the slogan for the locally-initiated but provincially and nationally-coordinated action on rising tuition, decreasing student financial aid and record unemployment.

NSD activities will mostly consist of seminars and workshops on the individual campuses, with little emphasis placed on demonstrations or other forms of "protest". At the national and some provincial levels, meetings with cabinet ministers are planned by student leaders.

The national and provincial student organizations have concentrated on promoting NSD through extensive poster and leaflet campaigns, and through a series of background papers which will form the basis of discussion of the four major themes: tuition fee hikes, regressive changes in student aid, and high unemployment.

In all provinces where tuition varies from institution to institution, one or more schools have hiked fees. The provincial and national student organizations have argued for some time now that rising tuition, coupled with regressive changes in already inequitable student aid programs, act as a deterrent to the government's professed desire to see universal accessibility to post-secondary education a reality.

Chris Allnut, a researcher with the Ontario Federation of Students, argues for the abolition of tuition on the grounds that it acts as a financial barrier to many who desire a higher education and is a type of "regressive" taxation.

Allnut's main argument is that an increased share of the costs of higher education should be borne by the sector that benefits most from a skilled labor force: private corporations.

The figures show that "the corporate sector depends on a constantly increasing level of education in society as a whole to maintain its relative position in the world economy."

Rather than responding with demands that tuition be increased to lighten the tax burden on working people, organized labor has joined student groups in demanding the abolition of tuition. Allnut notes, pointing to the recent support for this position from the 2.3 - million member Canadian Labour Congress.

Those who favor a continuation or increase in tuition often pose changes in student financial aid programs as a solution to financial barriers to post-secondary education. Higher grants and fewer loans, all-loan programs with repayment contingent upon the student's ability to pay after graduation, and all-grant plan for students from low-income backgrounds have all been proposed in various forms.

Allnut in his paper takes issue with all these schemes, pointing out studies which show working people find loans of any form a deterrent. The latter proposal includes a means test, which Allnut says "discriminates against middle income families who are usually assessed as being able to contribute an unrealistically high sum to their child's education."

Provincial student aid programs vary from differing loan-grant ratios to Alberta's all-loan plan. Most are less generous than Ontario's program, starting with loans based on either the old or new maximums allowed under the Canada Students Loans Plan (CSLP) - $1400 or $1800.

In a brief on financial aid the national union cites the observation of the recent OECD Examiners' report on Canadian educational policy that CSLP "has not made a significant impact on the representation of students coming from the lower half of the family income range in post-secondary education."

Significant among the NUS recommendations in the brief are demands for the elimination of the arbitrary summer savings contributions and the lowering of the age at which a student is considered financially independent under CSLP criteria.

NUS also demands that repayment of loans begin six months after the student finds full employment, instead of six months after graduation, as is currently the case.

Rodriguez, in a statement, cited studies showing that students from families with incomes less than $6000 yearly had only a 25 per cent chance of attending university this fall, and a 47 per cent chance to attend other post-secondary institutions. Another study shows students from income backgrounds of $15,000 upwards are three times as likely to go on to higher education as the former group.

NUS recommends that students' contribution be assessed on the basis of their actual earnings, as is the case in Nova Scotia.

The Queen's Journal Friday, November 5, 1976

Faced with record unemployment among students seeking summer jobs, the national and provincial organizations made unemployment their top priority over the summer, and delegates to the NUS conference in October voted to make unemployment a NUS priority following National Student Day.

The Canadian Labor Congress, as part of its opposition to the wage and price controls program has demanded the government make full employment its number one priority.

Manpower minister Jack Cullen's recent announcement of his "five-year employment strategy" did little to assuage the opponents of the Trudeau government's restraint policies. It promises the creation of a "Canada Works" and a "Young Canada Works" program the latter aimed at students, to provide 61,000 jobs and 21,000 jobs respectively. The student jobs are to be based on provincial minimum wages and are of short duration, lasting up to 14 weeks.

Meanwhile, the ministry raised the minimum time required to be eligible for Unemployment Insurance to 12 from eight work weeks, effectively disqualifying many students who may need the benefits if they fail to find work the following summer.

Cutbacks in public expenditures - social service and education costs - have been left in every province at steadily increasing rates in the past three years.

Nationally, the current estimates from Statistics Canada for the 1976-77 academic year show a decrease in non-university sector of post-secondary education to 11.6 from 17.8 per cent the previous year, and 10 per cent from a previous 19.5 per cent for universities.

Under the Fiscal Arrangements Act there is already a 15 per cent ceiling on increases in fiscal transfers, through which the federal government matches dollar-for-dollar what the provincial governments spend from their own revenues. Federal proposals in recent negotiations call for a reduction in these payments and the elimination of revenue-guarantee meaning the loss of between $750 million and $1 billion for provinces affected by federal tax revisions.

Federal officials have admitted the new proposals, which include a transfer of taxation powers to the provinces, and cash grants based on the growth of the gross national product will mean further reductions in public expenditures.

The NSU brief notes that provinces frequently inflate their operating budgets to attract more federal revenues and then divert the funds into other areas. It calls for strict federal control over the transfers to ensure these are used for post-secondary education.

As the author of a NUS discussion paper puts it, "At the present time, students' interests do not coincide with those of the government and corporations. The latter seem determined to compromise accessibility to post-secondary education and students will have to fight in order to keep their fundamental right to higher education."

The Queen's Journal Friday, November 5, 1976

The nature of writing on jazz is changing markedly. In place of appreciators whose main means of analysis were adjectives, we are beginning to see historians and critics applying the disciplines of historical and critical tradition from other fields to jazz.

The highly branched, often esoteric, spectrum of jazz has indeed become so broad that we are now witnessing strife within our own ranks. No longer does it suffice to proclaim your allegiance to America's only native art form, jazz. Visualize the confrontation between a passenger on Duke Ellington's 'A' Train and a disciple to alto astronaut Anthony Braxton's solo excursions which can only be described with a mathematical structural formula.

However, the internal conflict within the jazz ranks can in no way be detrimental to the development and immortality of the music. Conversely, the castle does not fall but the enthusiast inherits a renewed objectivity in relation to the music. No longer are we burdened by the mental barriers which may have fixed a predetermined format for the essence of jazz. The swing era buff refuses to acknowledge the new music as a jazz form and hastily dismisses it as 'anti-jazz,' a familiar term in the jazz revolution of the sixties.

What does anti-jazz mean and who are these gifted breed who have appointed themselves guardians of last year's blues? What is the definition of jazz and who was authorized to delineate it?

And thus jazz, analogous to the word 'love', has permanently forfeited all remnants of specificity. (I love Coca-Cola.) This revelation by no means marks the death of jazz but encourages the destruction of constricting subdivisions that mask the root of the issue, music. In fact, it was no printer's error that caused the

The evolving history of jazz

word "jazz" to appear in a handful of sentences in the entire autobiography of Duke Ellington.

The inherent trend towards specialization and subdivision has plummeted us into a tunnel of conformity. Often appearing to be pawns of the media, we are accustomed to standardized time signatures and rhythms in our daily drama. Any departure from the 'norm' (if it exists) is looked upon with distaste. The reactions to the bebop revolution of 'Bird' or the free innovations of Coltrane met this fate. A core of listeners began to breed who thrived on the music in a manner unheard of in popular circles. He studied personal styles, influences and collaborations with an admirable vigour and enthusiasm. The jazz enthusiast was not the "scrawniest, hairiest and most discontented human species of all time" from the 1960 Reader's Digest's "Life Among the Beatniks."

Today, the picture remains much the same. Denied wide media exposure, jazz fans huddle around the gramophone until the needle wears blunt to hear a new Swedish import of Dexter Gordon and Jackie McLean. A new door has recently been opened in the name of jazz.

Superior jazz artists of the past have relocated their energies into media imposed, publicly acceptable channels. Hence the former "Emerson, Lake and Palmer" fan is now raving about this 'new' keyboard whiz Herbie Hancock, of the devotees of the heavy metal who feel the absence of Jimi Hendrix or Duane Allman are turning on to this 'new' guitar virtuoso John McLaughlin or Larry Coryell. Mention the fact that these gents were exhibiting their talents when we were grooving to the Dave Clark Five and 'Beach Blanket Bingo' and you may be spawning a new ex-friend.

The commercial nature of the new fusion music is not the issue here, nor should it be. The introduction of the rock listener to some intricacies never encountered in 4-4 rock 'n' roll may be enough to spark the drive necessary to submerge yourself in jazz today. Our role at CFRC is to present the eager, curious listener or the seasoned student of jazz with a variety of music forms currently lumped into jazz for categorization's sake. You may hear the solar sounds of "classical" musician John Cage or a ragtime strut from Jelly Roll Morton. The emphasis is on free musical forms from a variety of viewpoints. Jazz has been assigned significant hours at CFRC, Thursday through Sunday from ten till midnight. Thursday highlights the contemporary and abstract angle balanced by a traditional format Sunday night.

Friday and Saturday are less rigidly defined and point to diversity. The jazz musician in America has often been associated with the social struggle and expressions of the American Black. Where is the expression going? What will it lead to? What does it characterize? What does it make us feel like? What is its image? Jazz content, of course, is as

Peter Pears and Osian Ellis

Renowned tenor will appear

Tenor Peter Pears, one of the principal adornments of England's musical world, will appear in recital at Grant Hall on November 11th.

Associated for over three decades with the music of Benjamin Britten, Pears has created more than a dozen operatic roles for Britten as well as seven song cycles, cantatas, canticles, the "Spring Symphony," and the "War Requiem." In addition he is famous as an interpreter of Bach and of German lieder, and more recently of Elizabethan and Jacobean music.

Pears achieved his most recent international acclaim with the Metropolitan Opera through his portrayal of Aschenbach in Britten's opera "Death in Venice." He was 64 at the time which made a great performance all the more remarkable.

Pears started singing as a young child - to the embarrassment of his parents - joining in the anthems with the choir in Salisbury Cathedral. At Lancing College he was already a skilled pianist, and after Lancing, he was for a short time organist at Hertford College, Oxford, later returning to his preparatory school to teach subjects from Greek to sports. While teaching he started his vocal studies, performing as the Duke in "Rigoletto" at The Royal College of Music after only four lessons.

Pears met Benjamin Britten while singing in the chorus at Glyn-debourne and they subsequently toured the U.S. as a duo. Returning to England Pears joined Sadlers' Wells Opera company and in 1945 created the now legendary title role in Britten's "Peter Grimes." Together, they have also toured South America, Europe and the Far East.

Pears will be accompanied by the eminent British harpist Osian Ellis. Pears told the New York Times that "Some composers have already written songs for us," referring to the unusual harp-tenor combo, and noted that Schubert and Schumann had written songs for a harp accompaniment.

Tickets for the recital may be obtained from the Performing Arts Box Office in the old Students' Union.

Bews News

by Mike Gouinlock

Quarter-final flag football action got underway Thursday night. No results were available at press time, but the betting lines went as follows:

Game No. 1 Mining (3-1) vs Civil (4-0)

Mining was unimpressive in their last outing, an 18-0 shellacking by Arts 77, however they knocked off a powerful Meds team early on in the season and have proved they can win. Their defence was second in its league against the run but last against the pass. Civil should test this defence as it has an extremely powerful running attack, but their attack seems to stall around the goal line. The Mining quarterback likes to go to Berzins but if he continues to put up the dukes as he did against Arts 77 secondary that was devastated by injuries last week, he may find more than two of his passes will get picked off. Betting Favourite: Civil by 10.

Game 2: Electrical (3-1) vs MBA (4-0)

MBA continues to play just well enough to win. Their offence has sputtered all year long. If MBA is to continue its winning ways it will have to get both the pass and the run working at the same time. Electrical is somewhat of an unknown quantity; however, their bubble should burst against the powerful MBA defence. Electrical is stronger against the run than the pass so look for Muir to put the ball in the air. Betting favourite: MBA by 13.

Game 3 - PHE (3-1) vs Arts 78 (3-1)

This should be the closest battle. After a slow start, PHE has coasted in its last three games. Quarterback Bruce McFarlane likes to go long to the "Bomber" and "Powie". He has the strongest arm in the league and will probably have to use it as 78 is strong against the run. 78 has the second best running attack in the league led by Kerry Powell and Jamie Domansky. Penalties have been costly to this team and PHE may be able to capitalize on these mistakes. Betting favourite: Arts 78 by 1 in the mud.

Game 4: Arts 77 (4-0) vs Comm. 79 (3-1)

77 is riding a twelve game unbeaten streak and boasts the most balanced attack in the league. Running backs Jim Beag and Hugh Statten finished 1-2 in rushing and quarterback John McDiarmid has the highest completion percentage. Their defence has allowed a mere six points and should be able to control 79, whose attack is too erratic and unorganized, however 79 has some trick plays and they could pull the upset. Betting favourite: Arts 77 by 10.

ADMINISTRATIVE NOTES...Rec. League Basketball entries are due on Monday, November 8 at 3:00 p.m. Games will be played on Sunday evenings between 6 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Applications are available in the Phys. Ed. Office and no Bews, Intercollegiate or City League players are eligible.

Soccer Gaels in 3rd

Waterloo wins

by Gary Harvey

Another O.U.A.A. soccer season drew to a close last Saturday, with University of Toronto capturing the provincial title. Toronto placed second in the eleven team league behind undefeated University of Waterloo, but managed to defeat the Warriors by a 1-0 score in the final. Waterloo beat Toronto 3-0 in the regular season and had to be rated as the favourite in the championship game, especially with the home field advantage.

Toronto's goal was scored with about one minute left in the match, by the team's high scorer Yannis Vassiliou. Toronto now advances to the Canadian finals to be hosted by Concordia University of Montreal.

Our own Gaels ended up tied for third place with a 6-2-2 record. Their two losses came at the hands of Waterloo and Toronto respectively. Queen's last game of the year, a postponed match with Trent, was defeated by Trent, but the results of the match held little bearing on the league standings.

Graduates of this year's team include Jacques Shapiro, Pete Hill, Gary Harvey, Gord Taylor and Bob Davey. This leaves a high percentage of returning players to form the nucleus of next year's team, when Professor John Walker returns as coach. Thanks to this year's coach, Don Baragar, and congratulations to the team on a successful season.

Gaels win and lose in Toronto

Time runs out for rugger team

by Dick Hertz

Queen's Rugby emerged from last weekend's action in Toronto with one win and one loss. For the first XV it was their second loss in as many weeks. Going into the game the Gaels were tied for first place in the O.U.A.A., yet after the outcome, there is no chance for a play-off berth this year. The University of Toronto Blues, a markedly improved side over previous years, kicked four penalties to give them a 12-0 lead at the end of the first half. At the outset of the second half, it appeared that the Toronto domination would prevail, when Mike Hunt took the ball in for a Toronto try.

With less than fifteen minutes to play in the game, John Gibson finally put Queen's on the scoreboard, with a penalty kick. These three points served as an impetus to excellent rugby as far as Queen's was concerned for the rest of the game. Scrum-half Jim Gray scored a try, which Gibson converted to narrow the margin to 16-9. Queen's was able to capitalize on a Toronto penalty with John Gibson doing the kicking, to make it 16-12 before Jim Gray split

B-ball face tough task

The 1976-77 edition of the Queen's University men's basketball team has its work cut out for itself this weekend when it opens its home season against Laurentian tonight and Western tomorrow night, both games starting at 8.15. The Friday night game will be preceded by a contest between the women's teams from Queen's and Laurentian.

Coach Smith has received information that Laurentian has already beaten Erindale 109-59 and Lakehead twice 99-85 and 100-79. Laurentian will be fielding a tall fast team that is a pre-season favourite to go all the way in the All-Canada championships.

In addition to most of the returning squad members from last year, Laurentian has added two outstanding players that Laurentian's new coach, Richie Spears, brought with him from Dawson Community College. They have also added Steve Petiford a 6'4" forward from British Columbia, who was reportedly the leading scorer on the west coast last year.

On Saturday night the Queen's - Western game should provide an interesting brother against brother contest when Kim Carlton, a freshman at Queen's faces his older brother, who is a senior starter at Western.

At half-time of the Laurentian game an added attraction for the evening will be a frisbee demonstration by the Molson Diamond Frisbee Team.

the uprights from forty yards out with a drop-kick to move the Gaels to within one point. Queen's continued to press into the Toronto end, yet were stymied several times in a row, very close to the goal line. Toronto managed one additional penalty kick to win the game 19-15. A notable rugby authority was heard to utter on the sideline at the end of the game the words of Vince Lombardi, "No team ever loses, they just run out of time!"

By contrast, the second team left Toronto the undisputed leaders in their league this year, with a 16-0 win over Toronto's second team. Tim Hyde counted for the two Queen's tries and Alun Williams complemented with the kicking to round out the scoring. If there is a seconds championship this year, it is certain that Queen's will be represented by a very strong side.

Tomorrow Queen's will finish their regular season when they travel to Guelph University. Though neither first team now can make the playoffs, it is sure to be a tough match, as both teams were serious contenders in this year's tight OUA race.

Wings Driving

Cac's Corner

by Chris Chenoweth

Seen any good jokes lately? Catch the next Toronto Maple Leaf-Detroit Red Wing match up to see humour at its best. Of those two clubs, certainly the hockey history of the Detroit Red Wings has to be one of the funniest, yet saddest, in the N.H.L.

You see, folks, I've been a Red Wing's fan since I was young enough to remember my hero, Carl Brewer, playing for them back in the sixties. Carl was not only an ex-Leaf All-Star defenceman, but also the greatest blueline general ever to put on skates. Those were the days the Wings were in their heights of glory. Winners of consecutive Stanley Cups from 1955 through 1957, the Detroit club was in command of the league until the emergence of the fabulous Canadian-Leaf rivalry of the middle sixties. Look at Detroit's lineup - as a testimony to greatness. On defence Marcel Pronovost, Brewer, Bill Gadsby, Doug Barkley (who was 1965 rookie of the year and All-Star until an eye injury ended his career), and Leo Boivin made up a blueline corps that was the best. Goaltending was always superb, with the job alternating between greats Harry Lumley, Glenn Hall, Terry Sawchuk, Roger Crozier and Roy Edwards - all of them All-Stars at least once in their respective careers.

At forward, the Detroit organization was blessed with the greatest hockey player of all time, Gordie Howe - Mr. Everything who taught Bobby Orr how to tie his skates. On offence Alex Delvecchio, Norm Ullmann, Pete Stelmowski and Marcel Dionne centered for such greats as Ted Lindsay, Bruce McGreger, Garry Unger, Paul Henderson, and a host of other stars - most of whom proved to be either future Toronto Maple Leafs, or Leafs of old re-generated to greatness.

Which brings me to the present day Detroit organization. It seems the Red Wings' management has made one or two too many trades, and fired and re-hired too many coaches, such as Ned Harkness, who never belonged in the game in the first place.

Results? The Wings haven't even made the playoffs since 1969. In doing so, they have been unable to defeat even the Washington Capitals in season play, a feat that no other club in hockey has so infamously duplicated. Crowds in the Olympia Stadium are dropping below the 10,000 mark, and hence one of the oldest franchises in the history of the league is in trouble. Why? Pete Mahovich explained to me, after the recent Canada Cup series, his feelings about the Red Wings. "I was glad to get out of the Detroit organization. The ownership just didn't inspire a team spirit, or even back up a coach. Players who showed any signs of potential were quickly shipped off to other clubs in return for older, more loyal hockey hawks." Pete's own career began in Detroit, and his huge success with the Montreal Canadiens serves as sad testimony to the Wings' managerial ineptitude.

The list of ridiculous trades through bad management goes on like a hockey horror show. Ex-Detroit players still starring in hockey include Gary Unger, a 50 goal scorer for St. Louis; fifty goal man Tom Webster of the W.H.A.; Howe himself, who received the shaft at the hands of the Wings after 25 years of great service; L.A.'s Marcel Dionne; Pittsburgh's Ron Stackhouse, and Boston's veteran 500 goal man to name only a few. Only the Toronto Maple Leafs claim a management that is quite so stupid and rigid in its player development policies.

What does owner Bruce Norris have to show for those pathetic trades? Crater-faced Bryan Watson, who only uses his face for a punching bag, a crippled Mickey Redmond, and the future rights to Muhammed Ali.

In my ten years of suffering, I have had the pleasure of meeting only 3 self-admitted masochists who would even admit a liking for the Detroit Red Wings. But just you watch folks. Just as the Yankees came back, so will the Wings in 1978 (give up on this season) Detroit still has the rights to 48 year old Gordie Howe. Draft Gordie after his contract expires with Houston this year. Appoint him the new Wing Messiah and bring back all the old Wings of the fifties out of retirement. Just watch Geritol go to work in Detroit next year.

The Spirit of '76 in Philadelphia with Doctor "J"

by Tom Shand

Philadelphia has traditionally been referred to as the city of brotherly love. In sports circles this adage was quite liberally applied to the perennially abysmal condition of the city's representatives in big sports. As a result names such as the Philadelphia Flakes would have been more appropriate than Flyers or Eagles in indicating the competitiveness of the teams.

However in the past few years Philadelphia has more than abandoned its passive "let me be your doormat" image and has quite possibly evolved into the current sports capital of America.

There is doubt that this transformation has embarrassed the hell out of sports reporters from the publicity capitals of New York and Los Angeles who are still reliving the glory days of the Knicks, Mets, Lakers and Dodgers. This is why the country is always taken by storm when come playoff time the national networks unleash upon the unsuspecting public a Philadelphia team who somehow or other have made it into the playoffs.

This rude awakening of "stand on your reputation" sports powers by the innovative young Philadelphia teams has spread from sport to sport. It began with the arrival of Bobby Clarke and Fred Shero who quickly changed the nation's image of Philadelphia.

Actually hard hitting is not exactly new to those in the know about the Philadelphia sports scene as the city of brotherly love the spawning grounds of world class heavyweights Smokin' Joe Frazier and Jimmy Young as well as four of the world's top ten middleweights. However, the fact that very few people connect Philadelphia with boxing but that everybody knows of the history of fights in Madison Square Gardens simply shows the extent to which Philadelphia's "toughness" image has been kept underground by the publicity centres

This year's Philadelphia Phillies also took the baseball world by storm and it was power that did it, not pussy footing on the basepaths. Richie Allen, Mike Schmidt and Greg "the bull" Luzinski have the potential to supply the power of which powerhouses are made, something about which even the 1976 Yankees can't boast.

To add to the new "physical Philadelphia" image are the Philadelphia Wings who are one of the finest lacrosse teams of the world. Lacrosse is another one of those sports in which physical control must accompany finesse in order for victory to follow.

Now that brings me along to the point where an explanation should be rendered as to why this article is entitled "The Spirit of '76".

In all probability the Philadelphia 76ers of the National Basketball Association acquired a dynasty in the past two years with the acquisition of George McGinniss and Julius Erving. Dr. J cost them the trifling sum of $6.5 million dollars. However the Dr. J magic should cure whatever ails the 76ers and the N.B.A., in general. He is quite simply the most exciting athlete in sports today. He is basically a million dollar man with flair, which accounts for the other $2.5 million of his 6 year contract. Although Dr. J had not played in five months he still drew an N.B.A. record crowd in his first game against the New Orleans Jazz.

McGinniss and Dr. J. were the best two players in the now defunct A.B.A. and will likely prove to be the same in the N.B.A. this season. Furthermore, 76ers have 7'11" Caldwell Jones (ABA) and a bench strength reminiscent of the Celtics of the Bob Cousy, Bill Russell era. In other words this team exudes the youth, depth, and power of a champion.

W.C. Fields left us with "All things considered I'd rather be in Philadelphia". Certainly if you're a sports fan who is tired of waiting till next year then there's no city in the continent where your chances of viewing a whole year of glorious victory are more strongly assured.

P.S. Fortunately for the Philadelphia sports fan, baseball and the winter sports overlap because the Eagles of the NFL were not affected by the Spirit of '76. However mark my words their turn will come, so look for the Eagles in '84!

Will need to play consistently, but . . .

V-ballers aim for top spot

by Brian Clarke

Consistency will be the aim of the Queen's University Golden Gaels when they walk out onto the volleyball court to begin another season of Ontario University Athletic Association action November 13th.

"If we can play our game consistently I believe we'll win our division this year," said Queen's coach Dale Huddelston. "But we have to play consistently."

Queen's seems to be without the two prime worries of volleyball teams, height and experience, this year. Only two of the Gaels are under six feet and greater than half of the 14 players have experience.

The Gaels schedule this season will consist of four tournaments in the OUAA Eastern Division. The East is divided up into two sections. Queen's plays in the second section along with York University, Yorkmen and the Royal Military College Redmen, while Laurentian University, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, and the University of Toronto Blues are in the first.

At the conclusion of the four regular season tournaments the two top teams from the OUAA Eastern Division will advance to the Ontario final, which will be hosted by the winner of the East. Therefore, it is not beyond the means of statistical possibility for Queen's to hold the provincial final.

Coach Huddelston, who has been coaching Queen's for two years and is presently working towards a teaching certificate at MacArthur College, believes that he has such a strong turn-out for the team this year that instead of cutting it down to 10 players as he did last year he is going with 14. Five players are Queen's veterans while three others have gained experience playing for other universities. It is a big improvement from last year when nine of the ten players were rookies.

Most impressive among the list of returning players are Bruce Rodin, and Biraj Bora. Both players were OUAA all-stars last year, and in addition played in the Canadian Junior Volleyball Championships last summer. Rodin is a second year Arts student and will captain this year's team, while Bora is in his third year of Engineering.

Queen's three other veteran Gaels are Peter Skalski, and David MacOonnell, both in second year Science, and Glen Markham, in second year Commerce.

Three players coming to Queen's after playing with other Ontario universities are Jim Young, Lyle Collins, and Ross Dumoulin. Young got his experience at McMaster University, and Collins played for the University of Guelph. Both are enrolled in teachers college. Dumoulin, the tallest player on the team at 6'6", played for three years with the University of Ottawa and is in his first year of law at Queen's.

Six rookies made the 14 player cut and coach Huddelston has praise for each and every one of them.

"There are some pretty bright lights among them and I didn't want to cut any of them. That's why the team has four more players this year."

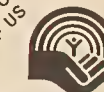

Two of the first-year players, Bruce Crawley and Brian MacLeod, are local talent, having both graduated from Frontenac Secondary School. Crawley is in third year Physical Education, while MacLeod is in his first year of Arts. The other four rookies are all in their first year of Arts. They are Al Kary, Steve Adams, Chris Manore, and Chuck Johnston.

The Gaels get their second test as a team this year when they play in their second exhibition tournament Saturday. They are competing in the Ottawa Valley Invitational Club Tournament which is being played at RMC and Queen's. The finals will be played at 5:30pm at RMC.

President Carter

After a close race Tuesday night, Jimmy Carter became President of the United States, the first man from the southern states to do so in 128 years.

Mr. Carter held a narrow lead early in the evening as the first returns were being announced, managed to hold on to it until all the votes were in and counted. He won in the majority of the southern states, but didn't do as well in the midwestern states where Gerald Ford did quite well.

Record numbers of voters turned out to the polls to vote for senators and other government officials as well as for president. A heavy voter turnout historically favors the Democrats, as it did on Tuesday. Mr.

Carter will be backed by a Senate and a House of Representatives with a large majority of Democrats.

Ex-President Ford went to bed before the election results were completely in, apparently thinking he would win. When he woke up the next morning it was all over and he was the first incumbent President to be defeated since 1932. Mr. Ford had been the only man to occupy the position of president without being elected to office.

Other Democrat victories include that of Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who defeated James Buckley in the battle for the senatorship in the state of New York. Mr. Moynihan, a former ambassador to the UN, won strong support from the Jewish and black voters. He has been a strong defender of Israel in the UN and has been outspoken on the Third World countries and civil rights.

Jimmy Carter went to the U.S. Naval Academy as a young man and worked as a nuclear submarine officer until he was 29. When he was 29, his father died and he returned to the south to take over his peanut farm. He expanded the farm into a million dollar business, dealing with warehousing and fertilizer as well as peanuts. In 1962, he entered politics when he was elected to the Georgia state senate. Later he became governor of Georgia, and then set his sights for the presidency. He announced his candidacy for the presidency at the end of 1974, and began traversing the country becoming better known to the American people. And finally, early Wednesday, he became the 39th president-elect of the United States.

Cabinet shuffle

Joseph Philippe Guay became Minister of state on Wednesday, as Andre Ouellet was brought back to the cabinet as Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and Urban Affairs Minister Barnett Danson switches to Defence.

Mr. Guay, will be Manitoba's representative in the Cabinet, replacing James Richardson who resigned due to his opposition to proposed language legislation. Mr. Guay has been the Liberal designated to shout "no", to prevent the opposition from having the unanimous consent they need for certain resolutions they bring forward.

Andre Ouellet resigned from the cabinet after he was convicted of contempt of court for comments he made regarding an acquittal of sugar companies charged with price fixing. Until being reinstated by Mr. Trudeau, he has been a back bench in the House of Commons.

Labor code

Labor Minister John Munro submitted a package of amendments to the Canadian Labor Code to the federal cabinet. The package includes provision for fair representation of member interests by unions, surveillance of union hiring hall operations, arbitration when collective bargaining for a first contract fails, and some others.

The federal jurisdiction applies to about 10 percent of Canada's non-agricultural labor force and covers industries such as shipping, transportation, communications, grain handling and Crown companies.

More power to Gandhi

A significant milestone was passed with the passing of constitutional amendments in the lower house of parliament expected to shift more power into the party in power into Gandhi's hands. The vote was 360 to 4, but most members of the opposition boycotted it.

Asoka Mehta, leader of the opposition, accused the party in power of "codifying the state of emergency, giving force of law to the concentration of power in Mrs. Gandhi's hands."

The bill that was passed substantially reduced the power of the courts, often a source of resistance to the central government's stern new position. The bill still has to pass the upper house, be passed by a majority of the state legislatures, and be signed by President Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed, but little trouble is expected in doing this.

Swine flu

The Ontario government began its swine flu inoculation program on Tuesday by delivering over 14,000 doses of the vaccine, Bivalent, to medical offices of health in Toronto. This mild type of vaccine will be available for those over 65 or who are chronically ill.

However most Toronto doctors have not let the public health department know how much vaccine they will need for their patients. If the doctors don't start inoculating their patients, the vaccine may be distributed through public clinics to those people who would be eligible for it.

The provincial cabinet is presently debating whether or not to begin a mass inoculation program with a stronger type of vaccine, Monovalent, for the 20-to-65 age group.

Immigration drops

Immigration dropped 22.3 percent in the first six months of this year compared with the same period last year. Immigration Minister J.S. Cullen attributed this to changes in the immigration laws tying immigration more closely to the needs of the labor market.

600 members as compared to Britain's 3,000 and the United States' 20,000 members. The groups are what the members wish to make of them, and the local group would welcome any new members.

An asteroid that orbits around the sun came very close to hitting the earth on October 20. It was only three-fourths of a million miles away, which is not very far in space terms, and if it had hit a major catastrophe would have probably resulted.

Adopted people over eighteen years of age in Britain will soon be able to legally obtain the names of their natural parents. In Scotland this has been possible since 1930, but fewer than 3 percent of those people who asked for this information ever met their natural parents face-to-face.

Dr. Elizabeth Bagshaw has just retired from her medical practice - at the age of 95. She has practised for 71 years, mostly in Hamilton, and when she retired in October she was still attending to fifty patients.

Fourth year poli-sci student Kit Spence-

Queen's student seeks Kingston's mayoralty

Chris Hall

Kit Spence announced his candidacy for mayor of Kingston by stating that "The City of Kingston needs fresh blood instilled in its government." Mr. Spence, a fourth year political science major, will oppose Alderman Ken Keyes, as yet the only other declared candidate for Mayor. Incumbent Mayor, George Speal, decided not to seek re-election this year.

Although Mr. Spence has yet to decide on his campaign goals, he feels that the people of Kingston will respond to the new ideas which he will present. When asked why he chose to run for Mayor instead of Alderman, Mr. Spence replied, "Two people are already seeking re-election in Sydenham Ward, (which includes Queen's main campus.)

Besides the interests of the community are better represented by Mayor." When further asked what experience he had in municipal government he replied "none, but I'm willing to learn."

Mr. Spence's decision to run for Mayor came on the wake of a motion passed at the AMS Outer Council meeting last Thursday. This motion called for the AMS Outer Council to encourage students to run as candidates in the municipal elections, and allocate up to fifty dollars per candidate to finance the Election Deposit. Chris McNally, designer of the motion, hopes student candidates in the election will improve the liaison and communications between the University and the residents of Kingston.

AMS wants student opinion only, referendum needn't form policy

by Anne Johnson

This past Thursday, November 4 Outer Council meeting heard some lively discussion concerning the upcoming November referendum. Council examined proposed referendum questions concerning the principle of free tuition, differential fees for foreign visa students, and the provincial government's rumoured tuition fee hikes. As a member of the OFS, the AMS has already taken a stand on these issues, and therefore the discussion centered on whether to make the questions a public opinion poll or a referendum. It was pointed out that a referendum would automatically bind the AMS to a decision made by the students. If students did not support the AMS in its stand, it might become an embarrassing situation for the AMS. Being a representative body, it would have to publicly reverse its position on the issue, especially within the OFS. However, a public opinion poll is not automatically binding, would not commit the AMS one way or the other, and would therefore only assess the students' feelings on the matter.

Councillor Bill Burgess introduced an amendment which would have changed all the questions from a referendum to a student opinion poll. Council was divided over the issue. Burgess contended that if Council were bound by student opinion, it would have to reverse its stand in the OFS. Argument against the proposed amendment revolved around the fact that Council would look as if it were avoiding taking the responsibility for the results. Hugh Christie, External Affairs commissioner, said he favoured a referendum over a public opinion poll, because for once the Council would have to defend its position to the public at large.

The ensuing vote favoured the amendment, so that the question would now read: "The following is an attempt to poll student opinion. Do you support the principle of free tuition for post-secondary students?" Paul Steep, Vice-President (Operations), was concerned that the amendment changed the whole context of the question. He said that a public opinion poll "lacks the punch" of a referendum.

Although the same amendment was proposed by Burgess for the second and third questions, it was defeated in each case. On the November referendum, therefore, students will be polled for their opinions concerning the principle of free tuition, while their responses to the second two questions will be binding on the AMS.

Students Chochla, Pepper, make bid for rectorship

by Bob Reynolds

Nominations closed Thursday for the position of Rector putting two candidates, Morris Chochla and Tony Pepper in running for what may be the most influential of all student's positions. The Rectorship was left vacant when Bruce Trotter resigned the position in order to continue his studies at Oxford University thereby leaving his three-year term early.

Morris Chochla is presently in his second year of Law School and serves as Education Commissioner on the AMS. His opponent, Tony Pepper is a fourth year English and History student who has been active in a variety of campus activities including the organization of the 1975 Arts and Science Orientation Program.

The position of Rector is especially important as it represents the only student vote on the Queen's Board of Trustees, the body having control over all University finance and property. The Rector is also an administrative "ombudsman"; he or she is not officially attached to either the administration, the AMS or the faculty.

Bowing to student pressure the Rectorship became a student position in 1970. Before that time the office was held by such noted Canadians as Leonard Brockington, R. B. Bennett and O. D. Skelton.

Bus hijacking

As of Wednesday no clues were to be had as to the whereabouts of two men in their early twenties who made off with a Voyageur Colonial bus. They got on the bus in Toronto Saturday night. When the bus was a few miles east of Belleville one of the men poured paint thinner over the driver's head and threatened to ignite the liquid if the passengers were uncooperative.

One of the hijackers pointed a gun at the driver and smashed the microphone of the CB radio on the bus. The two men ordered the passengers to throw their valuables into the aisle, and told the driver to drive into Kingston. At the corner of Pine and Division Streets the men jumped out carrying about $300 in cash and some other valuables.

The driver, Mr. Kiomall, drove back to the Kingston bus station and was treated later at a Montreal hospital for burns to one eye, caused by the paint thinner. The two hijackers seemed to have been high on drugs, and it appeared that they were amateurs, since they were nervous and unsure of themselves. Composite pictures of the two have been made, and police are hoping for public cooperation in helping locate them. This appears to be the first time a bus has been hijacked in Canada.

N. I. P.

The Neighborhood Improvement Program has suggested turning many streets in its study area into dead end streets. The area is enclosed by Division, Queen, Rideau, Charles and Quebec streets.

Problems would be bound to arise for utilities service men and for city buses. For instance, it is proposed to block all Montreal Street before it crosses Queen Street. Street buses currently using the route along Montreal Street would have to be detoured along other streets.

Propaganda

The ministry of transportation and communications has issued a letter to the Public Utilities Commission asking that Ontario Government logos be placed on the inside and outside of all city buses. They should be two feet wide and seven inches high and have a message reminding the public that the government of Ontario assists this public service financially.

Mayor Speal is definitely opposed to this project. He wonders if the government will next want to "stamp" patients after every operation, the same as they stamp sides of beef.

The PUC at a meeting this Monday defeated a motion to accept the ministry's idea. The government is expected to go ahead with its plan, and they seem to have some reason to, they pay 75 percent of the cost of new buses here and 50 percent of the operating deficit for this Kingston service.

MENSA

The Kingston area is suffering from a lack of intelligent people, judging from the area MENSA membership.

MENSA is a world-wide group of people whose IQ level is in the top two percent range. Our local group, whose area stretches from Gananoque to Trenton, has only nine members. Overall Canada has only

Define the Rector's role

Perspective candidates in the upcoming Rectorship election by rights could hardly be admonished if they happened to display considerable ignorance about the office for which they are running. Fortunately, such is not the case. It is somewhat ironic that although unquestionably the Rectorship is an important position—the summit of student politics—it is unbelievably vague and ill-defined.

The Constitution of the AMS broaches the subject with some caution. "The Rector shall be the students' representative to the Board of Trustees" it states. It would seem therefore, that the Rector has unlimited scope in interpreting his role; how much time should be spent in the discharge of the perceived duties of the Rector?

Fortunately convention has eased this dilemma somewhat by imposing at least two roles on the position of the Rectorship.

The first is analogous to that of an ombudsman, consisting in the main of directing students through the appropriate channels if they need information or have a grievance. In order to fulfill this role effectively, the Rector must be well-acquainted with all aspects of the University administration. Former Rector, Bruce Trotter, referred to this role as a "red tape cutting function".

A second, and even less precise role, is that of acting as a "buffer" between students and the administration. Optimally, he should know people in both areas in order to be able to reflect and convey the opinions and positions of one to the other. In performing this role the Rector should maintain a stature that is aloof and quite independent of both student government and the University administration.

All this is rather ambiguous—and Mr. Trotter admitted as much last year to an AMS committee investigating student participation in university government. As a result the committee recommended to Outer Council that the Rector be asked to "write a brief definition of the position to be subsequently incorporated into the AMS Constitution". Yet this year's Constitution remains unchanged. As the new Rector assumes his responsibilities, the AMS should delineate the functions of his office as concisely as possible.

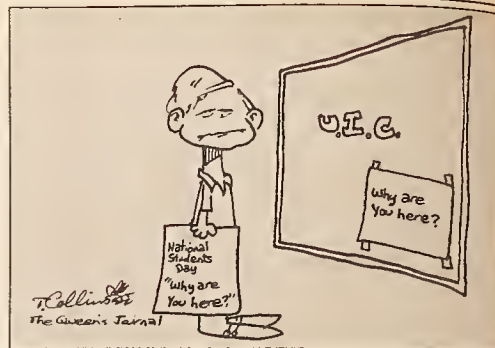

Participate today: NSD

National Student's Day is a day of events organized on campuses across Canada to emphasize concern over various student issues. We strongly support the notion of a "day of concern" and judging from the schedule of activities, the day could be of considerable worth to students. One of the most important functions of the day has been to attract the attention of the press. So far little notice of the day has been accorded by the press. We will know later this afternoon or tomorrow how successful the day has been in this regard.

We would encourage your participation in the day. The government decisions being made this year will have a profound effect on university not only for the remainder of your stay but for many future students.

Referendum inappropriate

On this page in September a Journal editorial commented on the relevance of the referenda in student governance. At that time we expressed concern over the potential over-use and mis-use of referenda. We concluded that "Policy decisions should not be removed from the realm of representative government. With rare exceptions only decisions regarding increases in the student levy should be made by the students. Otherwise Outer Council need not exist; what's the point?"

One part of the proposed referendum regarding free tuition has been re-designated as a "public opinion poll". There was strong discussion of this issue at the November 4 Outer Council meeting. In the final vote it was decided that, because its outcome was binding on the AMS, this question might jeopardize the previously-stated position of Outer Council: support for the concept of free tuition.

This confused state of affairs is ridiculous. Fundamental financial issues such as fee increases are the questions for which referenda were primarily intended. Policy decisions such as free tuition are not suited to a referendum. They are the responsibility of our elected representatives, the Outer Council and its resources.

Outer Council was right to demote this question to the status of a public opinion poll.

How effectively could the AMS Executive and Outer Council carry out their duties should public opinion go contrary to their policies?

Unfortunately the Council has absurdly designated only one question of the three to be asked eight days from now as "public opinion poll"; the outcome on the remaining two issues will form official AMS policy. It is as if to say "we know what we think on the issue of free tuition—but we're unsure about foreign student fees and rumoured fee hikes."

In all we find the referendum a hodgepodge of foggy thinking and an inappropriate delegation of authority for policy formulation.

OFS boycott ignored

AUCC meeting attended

by Michael Scott

This past weekend, in defiance of a long-standing Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) boycott, AMS President Jamie Avis and Vice-President Kathy Wood represented Queen's students at the annual convention of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC). The OFS instituted its boycott against the AUCC in 1973 when it was felt that the Association was serving university administrations and was lacking general student participation.

The AMS decision to disregard the OFS boycott was based on the unbinding nature of both OFS decisions upon member universities. The AMS has been known in the past to disregard OFS policies as was the case when OFS called for support for the Canadian Labor Congress' National Day of Protest.

Mr. Avis and Ms. Wood, were not committed to support any AUCC proposal and consequently were therefore not committing Queen's students to AUCC policy decisions. The OFS executive was aware of Queen's intention to attend the conference, but no censure is expected.

Also in attendance, in defiance of the OFS boycott, were delegations from Western, York and Victoria College at U. of T. The convention, attended by approximately 600 delegates from across Canada, included a series of seminars and workshops. There were, however, no major policy issues dealt with.

Ms. Wood stressed the freedom of delegates to disregard AUCC Decisions and characterized the convention as a valuable learning experience.

Laverty, Watson seek re-election

by Annette Nicholson

Six positions are open on the Frontenac Board of Education, and while nominations do not close until the twelfth of November, two candidates have declared themselves: Padre Laverty and Peter Watson of the Faculty of Education.

Both have served as trustees on the Board before.

Trustees serve a two year term and their job is to sit on the Board which meets every two weeks. The election for trustees is on the sixth of December.

The Padre's experience on the Board dates back to 1951. He is the past Chairman of the City and County Board, past Chairman of Committees of these Boards, past President of the Ontario Urban and Rural School Trustees Association and a former member of the Ontario School Trustees Council. He won in 1973 the Lamp of Learning Award of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, which is "presented each spring to a non-teaching resident of Ontario who has made an outstanding contribution to secondary education in the Province."

Professor Watson, a history-social science curriculum instructor, is Director of the Queen's University Project and Studies Unit Building Project and co-author of a number of history booklets used in Canadian schools. He has already served two terms on the Board.

He feels that it is important that Queen's students take an active interest in local education matters, since a large number of students become teachers. "With all the criticism being voiced about the quality of education in our schools, it is important that our future leaders concern themselves more about the state of instruction in our provincial schools," he said.

Laverty is running because he feels that he serves the community best by acting as a trustee. "I feel that I know the problems, some solutions and some things that won't work," he said.

"We've always relied on the private sector for help"

Queen's to canvass for $10 million

by Paul Henderson

In 1978, Queen's University will initiate a campaign to raise $10 million from the private sector over the following five years. Mrs. William M. Benidickson, Vice-chairman of the Board of Trustees and Chairman of the Queen's Fund Council, said that Queen's was not embarking on a building campaign, but rather a general purpose campaign to bolster six main areas, library services, scientific and technical equipment, modernization and renewal of facilities, research support, academic development and financial aid to students.

This emphasis on improvement of existing facilities rather than expansion reflects the university's sensitivity to statistical projections which indicate that starting around 1983, student enrolments will begin a sharp decline. It is also based on a decision taken a few years ago by

Administrators also teach Queen's in touch

by Annette Nicholson

Queen's has a fairly unusual policy which many other universities do not follow: the administration, particularly at the senior decision making level, is drawn from the faculty, who continue to teach while in administrative positions. Other universities usually have full-time professional administrative staff at all levels.

For example, Dr. Watts, the Principal, is a professor in Political Studies. Dr. Sinclair, Dean of Arts and Science, teaches physiology. Dr. Love, Vice-Principal (Services) is a physics professor.

According to Dr. Sinclair there are no real administrators at Queen's but primarily academics temporarily doing administrative work. He considers this a wise policy since it ensures that Queen's is run as an academic institution and that the administration does not lose sight of the real objectives of a university, which are teaching and learning.

There is, of course, a support staff at the middle management level: a quasi civil service of non-academics, who are very necessary to the smooth running of the university, but are not admitted to the top levels of decision making.

Dr. Love felt it was essential that the decision makers stay in touch with the students. When not teaching administrators tend to meet only non-typical students, he said. Since administrative officers only do a limited stint in administration and then return to teaching, Dr. Love felt it was important that they continue teaching. Sinclair called the policy a "trade off with efficiency." He felt the decreased efficiency which must result from not having professional administrators, is the lesser of two evils, since the danger of losing sight of the objectives of a university is of greater consequence.

Yet in the context of financial restraints and reduced budgets, the university must be able to formulate long-term policy, to deal with the government firmly and to set out clear policies and priorities.

Experts review Douglas Library

by Barb Ashdown

Last week Nov. 1st-6th, "A Panel of Experts" visited Queen's to advise the Principal's Advisory Committee in handling the problems facing Douglas Library. The Committee is presently questioning the Library Structure, says Prof. McInnis of the Economics Department, and it is hoped that the "expertise and knowledge" of three external consultants will give them the answers they are looking for.

The three consultants, Dr. Archer and Mrs. Howard from McGill and Dr. Rothstein from U.B.C., spent a week studying the library system and meeting with the administrative staff. They also met with representatives from the Professional Association of Librarians at Queen's and technicians in order to help provide the committee with positive solutions. With the help of the consultants, the committee will prepare a report on the future of Queen's Library systems, to be available the middle of next term.

Queen's to limit enrolment during a time when other universities were pushing extensive building programs. I. A. Courtright, Vice-Principal for Development and Information, said in an interview last week that expansion is no longer fashionable, and so rather than construct more buildings, existing buildings must be altered to meet the changing demands of society.

In that same interview, Vice-Principal Courtright pointed out that financial campaigns at Queen's are something of a tradition, and that the university has always relied on the private sector for help. Government subsidies only cover the minimum costs and Queen's, in an effort to maintain its "distinctive performance", has looked to its friends for support in this task.

The goal of $10 million was set by the Queen's Fund Council and as Principal Watts said, it was based on two factors, an assessment of need tempered by an assessment of what could realistically be achieved. The last financial campaign which ended December, 1975 went over its projected target of $6.5 million, so the university is confident that this campaign will be equally as successful.

Mr. C. E. Ritchie, Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer of the Bank of Nova Scotia, has been appointed as the campaign's chairman. It will be his responsibility to organize the volunteer staff who will then seek pledges on a direct personal basis as much as possible. Mr. Courtright feels that this approach is the only way to get results. These canvassers will be striving at the total involvement of people both inside and outside of Queen's by approaching students, staff, faculty, alumni, parents, corporations, foundations and other friends for donations.

We remember

The University suspends classes and laboratories for one hour on Thursday, November 11, to honour the sacrifice of those who went out and did not return, specifically 362 Queen's men in two World Wars; and to engage in a Service which is both remembrance of sacrifice and resolution for peace in our time. The twofold nature of the Service is indicated by the quotation from Stephen Spender standing alone on the front page of the Service folder: "They travelled a short while towards the sun and left the vivid air signed with their honour." And the quotation from Omar Bradley standing alone on the back page:

"It is easy for us who are living to honour the sacrifice of those who are dead. For it helps to assuage the guilt we should feel in their presence. Wars can be prevented just as surely as they are provoked and, therefore, those who fail to prevent them must share in the guilt of the dead."

The brief Service will be held in Grant Hall at 10:53 a.m. John Palmer will be the trumpeter, Douglas Atkinson will be at the organ and the Cantata group of the Queen's Choral Ensemble, under the direction of Denise Narcisse-Mair, will sing Healey Willan's "Behold the Tabernacle of the Lord". Principal R.L. Watts and AMS President Jamie Avis will read the Lessons. Padre Laverty will conduct the Service.

"Students among the best"

Big Sisters, Anyone?

by Laura Leavens

Would you make a good Big Sister?

A Big Sister is someone who is willing to make a commitment to a girl between the ages of 7 and 16 years. It consists of doing things together on a regular basis, whether it be going to a movie, spending a day in the park, pigging out on homemade cookies or simply sitting and talking about everything and anything both trivial and important.

The Big Sisters Association in Kingston has only been in existence since 1973. "It's still in an organizational state," says Dennis Main, co-ordinator. "Not too many people know about it. There hasn't been much money for advertising because Big Sisters is supported wholly by the United Way."

One might ask why there is a need for a Big Sisters Association. After all, most families have a mother or female figure living in the home. But Big Sisters is not based on the idea of providing a girl with a female figure. Rather, it's based on the fact that "all kids need somebody outside their family who will offer them friendship and confidence," according to Dennis Main.

Many little sisters come from lower socioeconomic backgrounds, probably because they are often from single-parent families where the single parent is a non-working mother on welfare.

An important requirement of a prospective Big Sister is that she be able to make a commitment of at least 1 year to her Little Sister. "The figure of 1 year is arbitrary," says Dennis Main. "Of course she wouldn't be forced to stick out a bad relationship for a whole year. The 'year' merely measures her commitment."

He stresses that "the Big-Little Sister relationship is not one-sided. It is, to use a cliché, a growing and learning experience for them both." He goes on to say that a good type of Big Sister is "someone who has succeeded in coming to terms with the world around her, seeing things in a clearer perspective. 'She is someone who wants to help someone else become as successful.'"

Dennis feels that students make good Big Sisters. "They represent to the Little Sister the idea of opportunity. Also, students seem slightly more flexible and easy-going than non-students, and it gives them an opportunity to get out into the community."

Dennis sees Big Sisters as having many directions in which it could develop. In the future, it could possibly provide: "a service to single female parents, for example, providing them with a referral service to community resources; be instrumental with work on Women's Rights, because it's the perfect opportunity to expose mothers as the 'ultimate victims of the system'; and become associated with the Queen's Women's Centre, based on its ideology of a female friend rather than role model."

Big Sisters is a young organization with a lot of potential and many directions in which to grow. And, being a Big Sister to a girl can be a rewarding experience like the time my Little Sister said to me that besides her mother, I was "the bestest person in the world."

Students interested in joining the Big Sister organization are encouraged to contact the Student Volunteer Bureau.

AMS to study student housing

by Chris Hall

The AMS Outer Council voted Thursday to establish a committee to examine the student housing situation, and write a response to the section on student housing in the City of Kingston's Paterson Report on housing. According to External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Christie, the response is necessary because the Paterson Report stated that there is no acute student housing problem at Queen's. Mr. Christie stated that "The housing situation at Queen's is a serious problem, especially for those upper-year students who live off-campus."

The committee will talk to various members of the Kingston community who are involved with the housing situation as it relates to Queen's students. Among those people are Alderman Louis Miller, who was on the Kingston Housing Commission as well as various landlords in the community who rent largely to students. Mr. Christie also said that the committee will ask for submissions from students as to what they feel the housing situation is like and what sort of solutions they recommend.

United Appeal - a good beginning

by Tim Runge

This United Appeal month could turn out to be the "winningest" ever held at Queen's. The United Appeal Committee has assembled some thirty valuable prizes generously donated by many Kingston merchants. Only 50c will buy a chance to win one of these thirty and since only 2,000 tickets are to be sold chances of winning are very good. Prizes include a Toshiba AM-FM radio and dinner for two at the Buttery. Also to be drawn for are records, cheese theatre tickets, clothing vouchers, sports equipment and more, all donated by local merchants. The draw will be held on Saturday, Nov. 27 at 11 p.m. in the Underground.

A bake sale is also being planned by the Committee. The campaign will climax during "Blitz Week."

The 14 member United Appeal Committee is working hard to meet Queen's target of $4,000. The A.M.S. has contributed $1,000 towards the student target.

One possible solution, that of having the University or the AMS buy houses to rent to students, is impossible. "The AMS and University cannot afford to expand services, both due to financial constraints and lack of personnel."

One further purpose for establishing the committee is to make first-year students aware of the housing problem. Many first year students are unaware of the competition for the few available houses off-campus. The committee could prepare a section on the housing situation for the Queen's Calendar, thereby informing first-year students of what to expect.

Amnesty: liberating 'lost' prisoners

In 1975, Mr. Sender Levinson, a metal worker in Bender, Moldavia, USSR, applied for a visa to emigrate to Israel. Shortly afterwards, he and his wife both lost their jobs, and in order to make ends meet, Mr. Levinson sold six pairs of trousers he had been sent from abroad. For this he was charged with "speculation in foreign goods" and sentenced to five years of hard labour. His whereabouts is unknown.

Sender Levinson is one of three prisoners "adopted" by the Kingston Group of Amnesty International. There are roughly 1600 such groups working throughout the world for over 4,000 prisoners of conscience - that is, people imprisoned for their beliefs, color, ethnic origin or religion, who have neither used nor advocated violence. By letter-writing, petitions, and publicity, Amnesty members seek to bring pressure to bear on the relevant governments to free prisoners of conscience and to give humane treatment to all prisoners. The effectiveness of these methods is well documented: special appeals for Prisoners of the Month have resulted in virtually one out of every two prisoners involved being freed or granted a reduction in sentence or transfer to better detention facilities. In its three years of amnesty activity, the Kingston Group has seen two of its six adopted prisoners freed before their sentences were up.

Amnesty's main point of reference has always been the individual prisoner. A.I. began as an offshoot of British lawyer Peter Benenson's 1961 "Appeal for Amnesty", a campaign which publicized the cases of a number of persons throughout the world detained for political or religious reasons. Local groups work for a particular prisoner, usually one who would otherwise not be known outside his own country.

Apart from the activity of the local groups, A.I. has consultative status with the United Nations (ECOSOC), UNESCO and the Council of Europe. Amnesty publishes reports on the situation of prisoners in particular countries (Brazil, Chile, Russia, and other countries), campaigns against the use of torture, capital punishment and other infringements of human rights. Also it organizes urgent action campaigns on behalf of prisoners whose cases are particularly critical.

Amnesty seeks observance throughout the world of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners. To bring to light the cases of the abuse of human and civil rights of prisoners, a Research department is maintained at A.I.'s International Secretariat in London, England, with full-time investigators who assess cases brought to their attention.

If there is sufficient information to show that a person is a prisoner of conscience, his case is handed over to a local group for action. Three prisoners are adopted by each group according to a principle of political and geographical balance; one "western", one "socialist" and one "third world" case are allotted to each group. This balance demonstrates Amnesty's impartiality and its independence from any government, political group or ideology. A.I. is financed solely by its members and by individual subscriptions and donations.

In Canada, Amnesty has over 20 groups in most major cities, with a head office in Ottawa maintaining liaison with the federal government. The Kingston group is currently working on the case of Mr. Levinson and on the cases of a Spanish conscientious objector and a young Brazilian student sentenced to over 65 years imprisonment under the Law of National Security; there is also a student task force working on special appeals for Russian prisoners.

We welcome persons to join us in working for those prisoners and furthering Amnesty's goals. The next meeting of the Kingston Group of Amnesty International will be held on Tuesday, Nov. 9 at the Grey House, Queen's Crescent (next to Victoria Hall) at 7.00 p.m.

Canada Campus Notes

Chevron press is still repressed

WATERLOO [CUP]-A general meeting of students at the University of Waterloo failed to resolve a dispute between the students' union and the student newspaper which has caused the paper to publish without union funds for more than a month.

Federation of Students president Shane Roberts said the Oct. 29 meeting, called to decide on new by-laws for the Chevron, was a "failure" after the only motion presented was defeated.

The staff have demanded the federation resume financing the paper and reinstate two fired editors before any by-law proposals or similar changes in the Chevron's internal operations are discussed.

Chevron news editor Henry Hess, one of the two whose position was suspended Sept. 24, accused Roberts of "killing" the meeting after his proposals for by-law changes were defeated by a large majority of the several hundred students present. Roberts denied charges of filibustering, and said he called the general meeting a failure because it was a "procedural nightmare."

Hess insists that Roberts wanted to drag on the meeting until the allotted time was up to prevent any other proposals or motions from reaching the floor.

The staff have been publishing the "Free Chevron" on outside funds ever since the paper's suspension because of alleged "irregularities" in the paper's internal workings.

The federation move was preceded by the resignation of Chevron editor Adrian Rodway, who cited "political pressure" from staff members as his reason.

Chevron staff say Roberts and others have never produced evidence supporting their allegations and that non-AIA people still constitute a majority of the staff.

Parti Quebecois says student group dead

MONTREAL [CUP]-The Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ) will have no input into Quebec education policy if the Parti Quebecois forms the next government.

"ANEQ is dead," PQ education critic Claude Charron said in an interview. It is ineffective because of internal ideological splits, he said.

Charron, a one time executive member of ANEQ's predecessor l'Union Generale des Etudiants du Quebec, said student input into the governing process is crucial and can provide "reflection where there is too much security, questions where there are too many answers."

"Students have a right to question, to criticize, to intervene."

"If there was a time when we needed them, it was in these four weeks," Charron said, referring to the upcoming provincial election, Nov. 15.

But, ANEQ has "disappeared off the map." Delegates to the fifth congress in October postponed all policy matters until later in November because choosing a new executive and central council took too much time.

The two day congress in Hull was taken up with procedural and constitutional questions and resulted in the expulsion of the former leadership, described by critics as Marxist-Leninist.

Postponed decisions included action on the national day of protest Oct. 14, National Student Day, Nov. 9, and a position on issues in the provincial election.

Plagiarism aided by profs

TORONTO [CUP]-Ever wonder where those essay-writing services, which sell papers to students at $20 to $100 a shot get their material?

A University of Toronto student has accused professors of partly aiding the dealers by leaving marked essays and term papers in the halls outside their offices.

Irene Wintersinger, president of the undergraduate full-time adult students' association says the practice encourages plagiarism because it enables students and term paper dealers to pick out the best papers.

She has heard complaints about stolen essays and says it hurts students because they aren't able to read professors' remarks.

However academic affairs chair Bill Dunphy said many departments have rules that prohibit leaving essays in halls. An economics professor commented that plagiarism is ultimately the students' problem and depends on what they want to get out of university.

Atlantic federation endorses Student Day

SACKVILLE [CUP]-The Atlantic Federation of Students (AFS) endorsed National Student Day with the hope that "the grass roots of Canada's student population will develop a heightened awareness of their situation."

However, delegates to the AFS conference here Oct. 31 admitted that many of them had done little preparatory work on their own campuses.

They were urged to return and do their best in the short time remaining. "At the very least, a general meeting of all students should be called and the students should be informed of the issues," they were told.

Avis sees decline of universities

by Jamie Avis, AMS President

Today is National Student Day. I would like to use this column today to reflect on the gloomy future which I see for Ontario universities. The essential problem which faces universities is the problem of maintaining both quality of education and accessibility in the face of financial constraint.

I cannot see any likelihood of either the government or the universities taking any clear initiatives toward a university policy for the future. I therefore predict that quality of education and accessibility will both decline as university funding remains inadequate.

Inevitably, tuition fees will rise. In the recent past, students have been remarkably successful in keeping increases in tuition well below increases in the cost of education. Public pressure to increase tuition is mounting. Dr. Parrot has announced his view that students should pay about 20 percent of the cost of their education. With inflation, that probably means frequent upward adjustments in tuition fees.

Naturally, higher fees will mean lower accessibility. However, OSAP is likely to be substantially revised in the near future. Perhaps innovative changes such as the introduction of contingency repayment plans will improve the effectiveness of OSAP, but this improvement may be offset by the replacement of grants by loan-only awards.

Despite increased tuition fees, the universities will not be placed in an improved financial position. The government will take advantage of the fact that universities receive this extra tuition revenue to channel funds away from universities toward other programs. As a result, financial constraint will continue and universities will be unable to maintain even the present standard of service.

Financial constraint will reach sufficient severity that faculty salaries will not keep pace with inflation. The merit pay system may well disappear under faculty pressure. Eventually, numerous faculty, tenured and otherwise, will be released for budgetary reasons. As if these consequences were not serious enough in themselves, they will contribute to the trend of faculty unionization. Faculty unionization will bring a totally inappropriate form of adversarial bargaining into the university, collegial decision-making will inevitably disappear. Because of the bipartisan nature of collective bargaining, student interests will not be protected in the negotiations, and students will become even more remote from university administration than they are now.

Just possibly the universities may be able to make some hard policy decisions within themselves, although there is to date no evidence to support confidence in this result. Perhaps we will see some rationalization of the province-wide system. Any such rationalization must, of course protect the autonomy of the universities.

We do not want a government-administered "University of Ontario", but unless universities show some accountability by making sound decisions designed to protect the quality of university education, the government may well move in.

It is hard to see any sunshine in the future for universities. I have just outlined a few of the imminent possibilities. All of them should be avoided if possible, but most of them are going to happen. Think about it.

Women strike for privacy

by Sophie Bissonette

The workers of Puretex Knitting Company in Toronto have voted to go on strike. The vast majority of the workers are immigrant women. They are fighting the textile industry which traditionally thrives on exploiting the cheap labor of unskilled female workers. This strike raises many typical issues concerning women in the labor force, poor working conditions, low pay, widening wage gaps between women and their "fellow" workers and the exploitation of immigrant workers in THE LABOR FORCE.

But this strike is taking a different turn: one of the major complaints is the installation by the company of TV monitors both in the working areas and in the dressing rooms. Mr. Gary Satok, the president of Puretex Knitting Company, must be congratulating himself on having both institutionalized sexual harassment and maintained strict control over the work of his employees.

Isn't it in 1984 that Big Brother watches over men and women's most intimate activities - such as dressing and undressing?

This TV surveillance, which is increasingly accepted as daily practice in the work place, is a powerful tool of social control; it ensures that workers will work under pressure and will lose not only control over the object they are producing but on their very actions and themselves. It ensures that workers will not communicate with each other to interrupt the work process and it weeds out potentially troublesome workers before they become disruptive.

But Mr. Satok figured that the TV monitors could provide lots of fun for him and the boys on the Board of Directors. Kill two birds with one stone. So he put some in the dressing rooms to watch his workers slowly undress, exhausted after long evenings of cooking, cleaning up, child care and putting up with irritable husbands. And Mr. Satok and the boys laugh as the women remove the remains of a personal life lived god knows where and put on tasteless, shapeless anonymous work-clothes. And Mr. Satok and the boys laugh at the women dressing after their shift as they smile thinking of the lover they will be meeting or their children or wince at the thought of the work awaiting them at home.

When a woman steps on a bus and is gauged, rated and dismembered by five pairs of male eyes, she is only an object to them. But she is in a position to hit back, to speak up and punch. In front of a TV monitor, this woman has lost all the possibilities of face-to-face interaction. For Mr. Satok, she is not even an object but an image on his screen and he can afford to laugh at his ease since the women cannot see him and he controls the monitor.

Sexual harassment on the job is a pervasive aspect of woman's life and it is ignored. In TV comedies - made by men - the secretary is always so willing to sit on the Boss's lap. How come in everyday life secretaries get fired for having refused to go along with their Bosses' sexual demands and others live through hell in order to keep scarce jobs? We cannot afford to laugh. That Mr. Satok had to go as far as installing TV monitors in dressing rooms proves only too well that women are now refusing to go along with their bosses' sexual advances in order to keep their jobs and that bosses are perverse enough to resort to such methods. It also shows how willing bosses are, driven by profit-motives, to infringe upon human rights.

The strike itself confirms women's determination to fight for their rights. These women are organized and their negotiator, Madeleine Parent, is an experienced trade-unionist heading an all-women team at the negotiation table. The strike concerns all women and all those working towards fundamental change to create a better society. Its outcome will set an important precedent.

The fight against arthritis

Perhaps you know whose hands these might be. It wouldn't be surprising. Last year in Kingston alone, there were 1330 patients seeking hospital treatment for some form of arthritis. It does not only affect the elderly either: no age group is immune to it and when one person gets it, the whole family suffers the consequences.

The immediate aim of the Canadian Arthritis Association is the control of the disease, similar to the control over - but not cure of - polio and diabetes. To this end, the association raises money for research and educates both the public and the medical profession. One rheumatologist recently estimated that of the 95,000 arthritis patients now in hospital beds across Canada, only 19,000 would be there if our current knowledge was widely applied and understood. Hence the value of research and education working together.

Fortunately, we can all help. To fund research and education, the Arthritis Association depends "about 99 percent" on the United Way. By contributing to this fund, we are helping to overcome the suffering of over a million Canadians.

Dialogue and Choice — by John Wood

There exists a great problem in Canada today. By 1978, there will be another federal election. Many people, however, will not vote wisely. They will say, as they have in the past, that the two major parties are the same, and their choice will be made with a flip of the coin. They will not care. This apathy can be explained quite easily. Neither major party has been able to arrive at a definition of their political creeds. It is the lack of this definition that causes the citizen to be confused.

In this writer's opinion, it is intolerable that Progressive Conservatives should be thought of as Liberals of a different colour. Unless we might never again have the chance to save Canadians from the Liberal surf. Each member of the party should take the time to reflect upon their own political beliefs and try to solve this question.

This writer feels that the underlying task facing Tories can be stated quite simply. Our party should not be one with a handful of leaders and a mass of sheep. Certainly we should be an association of reasonable people with some common ideals. We should be able to meet and arrive at sensible solutions to most problems. However, there must be room for personal opinions for with this comes creativity and vitality. If individual thought and action are stifled and members forced to follow a party policy all the time, creativity will disappear as able minds leave the party.

Differences within the Tory associations, then, are often times beneficial. A wider section of opinion can be viewed, and new ideas can be gathered. Perhaps of the greatest importance, the base of the party can be broadened. People can see that a more representative group of citizens have a hand in determining policy.

By permitting and encouraging this form of dialogue of ideas within the Progressive Conservative party, Tories can bring themselves closer to a more democratic basis where all can be heard and all beliefs respected. If such a view is upheld, Canadians would eventually have a well-defined choice of parties, and Tories would have a free-thinking and vital association.

Clearly, this is but one person's opinion of what Progressive Conservatism should be today. Many within the association might disagree vehemently with this view and offer other definitions. But surely that will be the best proof of the veracity of the present writer's opinion.

Students and Politics — by Sheilagh Dunn

Many students feel disinclined to involve themselves directly in political activities while they are at university. The opinion of the university population is transmitted by those elected to various student governmental positions. Problems afflicting the student population such as unemployment, financial aid and tuition fees are the business of specific pressure groups, especially the OFS. Thus, the individual student relays messages through organized groups. Then, where can the individual play a role significant to himself and others?

The three main political parties in Canada and Ontario have youth wings. These branches are composed of students and young working people and concern themselves with the problems peculiar to these people. Discussion about broad party policy and election activity are also facets of youth branches.

However, I feel that such a set-up is detrimental to the student who wishes to become genuinely involved in meaningful political activity. By separating the youth from the general party organization, the former may get an exaggerated idea of its role and importance. It may also tend to exacerbate any hostility held by the older members towards youth for any "radical" stands.

I feel the impact of the youth's activity and ideas could be much stronger if the youth were encouraged to join the political parties at the riding level. Here is where real, down-to-earth politicking and maneuvering occurs. At first, the youth may feel and be treated in a subordinate manner but this should be changed when the older members realize the worth of enthusiasm, spirit and hope.

Many students may also disdain the workings of political parties because of the widespread patronage. Some youth members do join political parties because it is a good way to make contacts. In a small youth wing, it's not hard to rise to an executive position and be noticed. All this helps when it is job-hunting time. But, you can either be very pragmatic or very idealistic about patronage—it's a fact of life or it should be abolished. In the meanwhile, however, there must be other reasons for joining a political party.

If you feel strongly about how Canada or Ontario should be run, membership in and working for a political party can do more than one vote. However, you must realize that there are always winners and losers in an election and losing is not always a bad thing. It is a means to build support and gain experience.

Membership in a party is an excellent means to inform oneself about issues and where parties stand on these points. When you find an area which is particularly interesting and challenging, you may want to devote more time to it. This can be accomplished within the party. However, party workings tend to be much like government—it favours consensus and compromise. If this method is not appealing to your interests, pressure groups exist for specific purposes to press for specific goals.

Therefore, to join a political party as a student may bring satisfaction or disillusionment. It can be a temporary state or turn out to be a life-long interest. Either way it could be worth a try.

Ready to Campaign — by John Campey

A Provincial election will not take place in the next few months. While it was unlikely to have taken place this fall in any case, the recent Gallup poll has ensured that next spring is the earliest possible date at which we will be trekking to the polls. The Gallup poll places the Conservatives first with 40 per cent of voter preference, and the Liberals and New Democrats almost neck and neck with 30 per cent and 28 per cent respectively. (I would personally be interested in knowing just how that 28 per cent was arrived at - the Toronto Star published a breakdown of the figures which gave the NDP 30 per cent in Toronto and 29 per cent in the rest of Ontario. I may not be a mathematical genius, but no matter how you look at it, it is difficult to average 29 and 30 and end up with 28.) In personal popularity, Bill Davis is out in front, with Stephen Lewis second, and Stuart Smith a dismal third.

On the basis of these statistics, the Conservatives would seem to be in a strong position to call an election. They won't call one this fall, for a number of reasons. While Bill Davis may be popular, Tom Wells certainly isn't, and this is reflected in the fact that in the group of voters aged 18-29, the NDP is well out in front with 41 per cent of the voters in that age group supporting us.

Before they face an election, the Conservatives want to try to regain some support among young people. An election held now, or soon after the coming announcement of tuition increases, would probably cost the Tories a number of University ridings, including Kingston and seats in downtown Toronto, Ottawa, and St. Catharines. For this reason, I personally think the Tories will again try to minimize the student vote by waiting to call the election until we are writing exams and moving home.

For the Liberals, a fall election would be disastrous. Their popularity continues to sag, and the abysmal performance of their 'leader', ensures that if an election were held in the next few months, the Liberal caucus would be decimated. Not only do the Liberals face a difficult time in attracting votes, they are faced with an electoral map that places them at a distinct disadvantage.

Many people have said that the Tories, feeling that it was the Liberals and not the NDP who were their main threat, gerrymandered the electoral map so as to make a Liberal election victory almost impossible.

This would seem to be born out by the results of the last Provincial election, in which the Conservatives got 42 per cent of the seats in the Legislature with 36 per cent of the vote, the NDP got 30 per cent of the vote, and the Liberals managed only 29 per cent of the seats, despite having polled 34 per cent of the vote. A drop to less than 30 per cent of the vote would cost the Liberals a great number of seats, and put them in a very poor third place in the Legislature.

As Stephen Lewis has said repeatedly since the Conservatives began closing hospitals last winter, the NDP is ready for an election. Morale is high, and 'Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition' is looking forward to matching wits, and policies with the Tories in an election campaign.

"Crest painting tradition is bastardized by political groups", Socialists and others reply to Balfourini's controversial letter

Dear Editor:

On behalf of the socialist movement, I should like to refer to the letter of one F. Balfourini entitled "Pray for Winter" in the Journal of November fifth. In Mr. Balfourini's letter appears an inherent contradiction. He states that "it is not my intention to injure the socialists" yet this is exactly what he has done as he says "this practice (of crest writing) is becoming bastardized by political groups". Is this not an attack aimed against the movement we hold so dear to our hearts? Instead of being a petty complaint about the aesthetic value of sidewalks, Balfourini's argument develops into a biased capitalist attempt to discredit, if not literally wipe out, our movement. If Mr. Balfourini had any sense of aesthetic beauty, he would notice that our crest conforms to the standard of any faculty crest. We seek to arouse the awareness of the passer-by just as the faculties do. Class consciousness must be aroused and people must be prepared for our imminent take-over. That our crest "is a bastardization of tradition" is unfounded and irrelevant, for is not crest writing an horizontal imitation of the "proverbial writing on the wall"?

Nicholai Hopkinson

Dear Editor:

This letter is in regards to the article entitled, "Who's got the severe case of Tunnel Vision at Queen's."

Until a few days ago all the crests painted on the grounds of Queen's University had one thing in common. They all had to do with university related subjects. Now is introduced a new type of crest, the politically oriented crest. I don't know about you, but I don't want to walk around campus looking at New Democratic Party crests, Liberal crests, Conservative crests, Social Credit crests and Socialist Coalition crests even if they are well painted. Why not leave the crests to the engineers, the Arts' and the others. The crests should be for the university and the university alone, not for anyone who wants to make a point.

Stephen William Booth

Dear Editor:

I am replying to the letter by the irate (?) Fredricko Baloufrini concerning the socialist crest in front of the Douglas Library. Does it really matter what lies on the sidewalks? As long as it is some cremated professor who really cares.

I do not believe that there was any necessity for Balfourini to write his letter.

Stephen Southern

Principal of the thing

Dear Editor

In view of the recent controversy about "illiteracy" at Queen's, we find ourselves compelled to point out a very blatant example of the rape of the English language in the October 29th issue of the Journal.

It seems rather ironic that the Education Commission as co-sponsor of the Last Lecture Series should consider Dr. Watts as a "PRINCIPLE" rather than the "PRINCIPAL" of Queen's. Ditto for Rev. Bater of the Theological College.

It is irrelevant who is responsible for this error we also realize that this is a very trivial example but it is the PRINCIPLE that counts!!(SIC)

QWC on Susie-Q: Victorian courtship shackles must go

Dear Editor:

Lately the Women's Centre has been voicing a lot of concern about the implications and connotations involved in the promotion of Susie-Q week. Although they state that they are not against the week in any way, they are doing a good job of suppressing enthusiasm by their nit-picking antics. Susie-Q week is a time out for a night on the town. If the Women's Centre passes up this golden opportunity to help the shy women of Queen's shed the shackles of Victorian courtship, it will, in my opinion, accomplish exactly the opposite of their intended goal.

Is university education worthwhile? P.C.'s OFS stand

Dear Editor:

Your editorial "OFS matters to youth" has made a number of serious errors resulting in a misrepresentation of the position of PC youth in relation to the OFS.

First, the paper does not urge UWO students to vote no. We do not wish to become officially involved in an anti-OFS campaign. The paper was not even distributed at the University of Western Ontario in an attempt to separate the PC party from the referendum.

Second, the editorial urges PC youth to "encourage moderate positions on campus". What the hell do you think we're doing Collins? The paper's purpose is to offer a more moderate perspective on student issues than the one dictated by the Ontario Student.

The position of the Ontario Progressive Conservative Campus Association is simply this "that a federation of students is an essential element of the student movement—a necessary pressure on government with respect to student issues. As moderates we believe the positions of certain student OFS'ers is extreme and that the structure of the union is highly undemocratic.

Finally, the coverage we have received at Queen's is reassuring. Bill Burgess has noted, for example, that the paper demonstrates the cash available to PC youth in a pre-election situation. Very good, Bill. We believe that campuses are important to us politically and we are willing to spend a bit of money to advance our particular position.

I might add that after reading Mr. Burgess' succinct analysis, I congratulate the AMS in choosing "Is a University Education Worthwhile?" as its theme for National Student's Day.

I miss you Bill

Dignity for the dying

Dear Editor,

Bravo to Howard Smith's article on euthanasia in Friday's (Nov 5) Journal. Anyone who has witnessed the inexorable agony induced by diseases such as terminal cancer would certainly attest to the validity of his perceptions. However, to suggest that "the blame should be levelled at the Medical Profession, for they... are the most implicated parties" would seem to be yet another example of buck-passing, of suggesting that "the other guy" raise the hue and cry. Many issues are only in need of a strong leader brimming with conviction to organize the various factions aligned to such a cause. My suggestion is that Howard provide the fire for this movement, for certainly his adeptness with the written word and his involvement with the law profession would be great assets, and when he does, I will be pleased to donate my available time to this worthy pursuit.

Lost'n lonely

Dear Editor:

My name is Leo Glass. I am presently incarcerated in the Marion Correctional Institution, in Marion, Ohio. Lost and lonely, like a babe in the woods, I implore you, dear editor, and the general public for correspondence and assistance. I've been down and depressed, for too long, without the care of my loved ones and friends! I am being used and abused by this thing called "Loneliness"! I've been tossed aside, like an out-dated toy, ragged, soiled and disregarded, this feeling is unbearable.

I sit in my 6 by 9 cubicle from day to day, counting the same eight bars that make the door that's constantly shut and brings on resentment that'll never fall! All I have is a million memories to pacify me, and undying hopes, that you, yes you, will publish this letter for me. I dread the thought of tomorrow, for all I see, is me, and this thing called "Loneliness"! I am 28 years old, 5'8", 150 lbs., single, black and not prejudiced. Thank you,

Leo Glass

P.S. Friendship is but love through understanding crest fallen

Dear Editor:

I am writing in disgust over the childish actions of a few unknown individuals. These kids proceeded to walk over a freshly-painted faculty crest not only on Friday night, which is somewhat inevitable but on the second coat on early Saturday afternoon as well.

Someone followed the yellow-coloured shape of the zero in the "80". Big bootprints were the end result. Following that, they scratched the lettering with one of the four barriers left to warn passers-by of the wet paint. Sure enough the barriers were taken and the crest underwent further abuse.

I certainly hope these 'children' would wake up and realize that they are now in university and not kindergarten. They should attempt, though it may be difficult, to understand that a lot of time and effort on the part of many students went into the designing, drawing and finally painting of our Year's crest.

Mark Krazicek, President Commerce

European Economic Community

Slow decline during the second decade

by Hugh Dodd

"There is an apparent decline in the dynamism of the European Economic Community," according to Dr. C. C. Pentland, of Political Science. His concern, as a political scientist, is to examine the effects of economic development on the political character of the Community in different dimensions.

Four different concerns must be examined, according to Dr. Pentland, in order to understand the situation in which the EEC finds itself today.

First, the strategy of integration followed by the EEC should be examined. In 1957, the Treaty of Rome became the founding document of the European Economic Community. The six original members of the community were Germany, Holland, Belgium, France, Italy and Luxembourg.

Between 1958 and 1968 policy making was a straightforward business. The "Common Market" evolved out of six independent economies. Economic, trade and tariff barriers were broken down between countries, and a common agricultural policy was created. That was the easy part.

However, after 1968 the EEC was faced with a redefinition of priorities. Now that the basic framework of the Community was set up, what should they do next?

There was resistance to further integration at one pole, and a desire for full integration at the other pole, with various formulas proposed in between. Full integration for the EEC implied a common currency and a common energy policy, among other things. These aspects are harder to formulate and more controversial.

Secondly, with regard to institutional development, a valid question is raised. Isn't a centralized government for the European nations an inefficient way of making decisions? Dr. Pentland suggests that "the Brussels bureaucracy is slow and cumbersome." Furthermore, he says that there is an uncertain balance of power within the government, with a tangle of authority divided among the EEC Parliament, the Commission and the Councils of Ministers.

"The Community is in the process of making," Dr. Pentland also submits. "The Parliament is in the process of acquiring more voting and budgetary powers." Thus an aim for the EEC government is to make itself more efficient and democratic.

In addition, there is the issue of international identity. Who should be allowed into the European Economic Community, and who should be left out? Furthermore, how long should this expansion process continue? The EEC admitted three additional members in 1972: Britain, Denmark and Ireland. Spain, Portugal, Greece and Turkey are presently being considered for admission.

When it was suggested that Europe has a wide diversity of cultural identities, Dr. Pentland said, "The cultural argument can cut either way." He added, "There is a great deal in Europe that is culturally close, for example, art and religion. On a global scale, it could be considered quite a cosy place."

However, if additional countries are added to the community, there is the danger that the common bond will be weakened. This predicament may be aggravated if the additional countries are significantly different in cultural nature than the present ones. It is a real concern when you consider the differences between Turkey and Germany at the cultural level.

To what extent has the EEC penetrated the daily lives of individuals? In order to be a fully developed political entity, the organization should have a significant impact of day-to-day living for Europeans. So far, impact has not been as great as the founders had hoped.

Political union has not naturally flowed from economic union, as the originators had hoped. What has happened?

There are several inter-related explanations, and the favourite one ascribes the slow progress to certain individual governments. France, under Charles DeGaulle, got the agricultural policy it wanted from the Community and then wanted out of the organization. This philosophy was dramatized by the non-participation of France during 1965 in EEC decisions.

Internal problems have also been suggested as a possible explanation. Italy and Britain have not been able to cope with the free trade policy of the EEC, because their products cannot compete effectively with goods from other countries such as Germany. On a more intangible basis, it is harder to get a consensus among nine member states than among the original six. Along the same line, the European public mood tends toward nationalism. Europeans generally feel more secure under their present form of government, so they question the need for change.

In addition, there is a growing dislike of centralization of bureaucracy. Dr. Pentland points out that the bureaucracy of the EEC is hardly a huge one, as it has only 10,000 people in it. However, the average "guy on the street" worries about the remoteness of yet another layer of government.

Within national governments an interesting paradox emerges. While spokesmen espouse the wonders of the EEC, national government bureaucrats drag their feet in transferring the responsibility from their sector to the community.

Finally, it has been suggested that during the first decade of the EEC there was innovative, dynamic leadership, something which is lacking as the EEC finishes its second decade. From 1968 to 1976, lower quality men, lacking the commitment of the originators, have been running the show.

These explanations for the lack of progress in the EEC's second decade are the more conventional ones. Dr. Pentland agrees with them to a certain extent, but he also has a few ideas of his own. Next week's article will examine his view more extensively, and indicate where the European Economic Community is headed over the next few years.

The government is cloaked in secrecy. The light of day and the eyes of the public have difficulty penetrating it.

The government considers public information its private property. It passes along only what it thinks the public should know. Civil servants are not obliged to tell anyone anything unless directed to do so by superiors and some estimates have the government withholding 80 percent of its information.

Recently, a producer of a radio talk show was looking for a very simple bit of information about a piece of land owned by the government. After talking to 12 people in the department concerned she finally got the admission that, yes, the government did indeed own the land. If she had the stamina to press the issue further she still might have come up cold. There is no legislative recourse for her to appeal a decision made by a bureaucrat.

All levels of society, in dealing with the government, experience the secrecy syndrome. In the spring of this year residents of Port Hope, Ont., attempted to find out how much radioactive waste was being dumped into Lake Ontario. They were met with official silence.

When Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau announced his wage and price controls last fall, many people wondered why he reversed his stand from the 1974 election when he so adamantly opposed such measures. What reports or facts or studies caused the change? The reasons for implementation were never made fully clear. The supporting documents have been well guarded.

In June the Consumers Association of Canada (CAC) passed a resolution supporting an Act respecting the right of the public to information concerning public business. It guarantees the "public's right to know". The association is concerned because secrecy in areas like food inspection, pesticide residue levels and pollution control standards may be hazardous to consumers. It is literally a matter of life and death to withhold such vital information.

To make a rational decision it is necessary to have all the facts. To marshal them people must have free access to information. Information freely given is one thing. Information carefully selected and channeled by the government is propaganda.

A number of interest groups have been calling for freer access to government information. The government responded in last month's Speech from the Throne by stalling and trying to appease its critics with rhetoric. It didn't propose any legislation, but simply promised it would present a policy paper to an official committee which has been formation is growing across the country as concerned individuals and groups form committees to lobby for strong legislation on federal and provincial levels. The type of legislation forthcoming (if and when it does come) and how information will be made available is still the vital question.

One of the controversies arising is the question of final decision in cases of dispute. For example, if an individual goes to Department X and is told the information requested is not available because it is secret or confidential, what then?

A civil servant said recently, "If a senior official or a deputy minister wants to keep back information all he has to do is refer to the Privy Council Guidelines of the Government Motion for the Production of Papers which outline the four types of classified information, and proceed to classify the documents as Top Secret, Secret, Confidential or Restricted. It then comes under the umbrella of the Official Secrets Act and effectively stops any information going out."

- have we been sold short?

Retiring Government House Leader Mitchell Sharp says the final decision in cases of dispute should rest with the minister involved. He advocates an information ombudsman to review cases of contention or denial, with the minister of the department retaining the right to deny the release of a report. Thus, if the minister feels the information requested is at all sensitive or could hurt the government, the secrecy lid remains on.

Others feel the final decision should rest with an independent body—the courts or an independent complaints board with the powers of a civil court.

The most radical Act, in the opinion of most experts in the field, would be one that simply stated all information is freely available to the public, as part of its basic "right to know."

There would be clearly-defined exemptions, though. This would mean amending the Official Secrets Act and perhaps other Acts which currently prohibit disclosure of information, especially in the area of national security.

Canada's information laws led a Conservative member of parliament who attended an international conference on Freedom of Information in Austria to comment that "Canadians, along with the British, have the most antiquated laws concerning release of government documents in the free world (sic)."

There are currently two freedom of information models to draw upon from the U.S. and Sweden. The U.S. first passed a freedom of information law in 1966, but the spirit of the Act was not being followed. In 1974, stiff amendments were passed which gave a citizen the right to take the case to court if a request for information was turned down. The case automatically takes precedence. Go to the top of the court list and is dealt with as quickly as possible. It is recognized that information is perishable.

There are also penalties for a U.S. civil servant who willfully withholds or denies an information request. The penalty is paid by the civil servant responsible.

In addition the U.S. has a Government Data Privacy Act which allows an individual to inspect and correct personal files.

In Sweden, free access to government information is embodied in the constitution, which dates to 1776. People have the right to all documents except those exempted by the clearly-written Secrecy Law of 1936. It is up to the civil servant to decide on the spot what is or is not secret. When the private citizen disputes the classification the case goes to the Supreme Administrative Board or the Parliamentary Ombudsman. However, the final decision rests with the Minister.

The Canadian government has already made a move in the direction of the U.S. model concerning access to personal files in government departments and agencies and will give an individual the right to request, inspect and correct personal files.

This means erroneous or misleading information will be corrected. It is not yet clear whether this proposed act will allow groups access to their files or whether the individual has the right of appeal if denied access to the file.

What a freedom of information act would do is bring about accountability. Politicians and bureaucrats would be held accountable to the public for their acts. In 1964, before entering politics, Trudeau used to speak of participatory democracy.

"Democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way people can objectively evaluate the government's policies. To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy," he said.

The proposed legislation, if and when it comes, will indicate whether Trudeau will hold to his thinking. It seems with the ascendancy to power of any government the urge to withhold information and to protect bureaucratic secrets grows. It now remains to be seen if "right to know" legislation will be passed by a "no comment" government.

Queen's first major production

"The Cherry Orchard" is like Russia today

by Liz Wood

Anton Chekhov's play The Cherry Orchard is a play about people, their possessions, and how that relationship may be resolved. The Queen's Drama department has chosen this play as its first major production. (This week, November 11th to 13th.)

The play concerns the Ranefskayae family and their estate, (complete with a gigantic cherry orchard) and a friend's effort to convince them to sell the estate for development. Ultimately of course, financial constrictions win out, even if in a never-say-die fashion, and the friend buys the estate and develops it himself.

Director Richard Trousdale doesn't think the play is topical but rather that it certainly displays a revolutionary theme. It is a play where the theme and plot are "carried by everyone", he told me. "You've almost got to rehearse a whole act at a time so dependent is one role upon another." This makes it an ensemble play to be sure, but Trousdale feels that there is one character, Petya the student, who does occasionally stand out. He is the voice of the future. In fact, Chekhov had to modify some of Petya's speeches (for example: "42 people sleeping in one room") at the time to suit the Czar; although these lines have generally been re-instated in modern times. The idea of atoning for the past (people owning people) through suffering and subsequent movement is Petya's and perhaps Chekhov's statement and hope.

The Cherry Orchard is most often played as a melodrama, in some productions reduced to a soap opera, complete with dark sets, pregnant pauses and all the trappings of "easy" drama. Trousdale doesn't see it that way at all. "We've tried to take the play the way Chekhov met it, some of those people really were foolish." Trousdale was also talking about the humour to be found in the play. (Perhaps typically Russian.)

There is certainly analogy in the play: old versus new, people versus money, are all reflected in the plot. Trousdale thinks maybe the change from old to new is only skin deep in Russia. The love of debate, the complete disregard for others while arguing about... (who cares)...well, its still with us. Trousdale was in Russia this summer and he found the authorities remarkably carefree and blasé about a lot of things. One of the chief reasons for his visit was to see Chekhov's birthplace and home. As a reason this was accepted and Trousdale was given his visa. But when, after almost endless travelling he found the house, it was closed for repairs, and had been for two years. No one seemed to care.

Trousdale spoke of his journey as walking "into a Chekhov play". Russia has changed on the outside but not on the inside. The people in the play are caught in "old habits"

although the real changes that take place are much clearer to them than they could be now.

The play is an allegory. Its not just about one orchard, one set of rich landowners getting poorer; it reflects the complete state of affairs in Russia in 1905. The orchard is beautiful but useless and certain people, perhaps miserably, say its got to go. That's the way things are.

The family's refusal to sell the estate soon develops into a sort of masochism, as happens in most Chekhov plays. We are made painfully aware of the inefficiency of the system, the opportunism and lordly expectations of the landowners.

The period costumes are colourful and convey the impression of a rich privileged class. Even though The Cherry Orchard is one of the great naturalistic plays, Tony Abram's set is not. It is a "frail" set composed of transparent layers of gauze and a "little furniture". The set tries to remain neutral. The lighting will try to create moods in conjunction with the actors' and Chekhov's intentions. Relying on lighting to this extent (to define set and mood) is rather innovative at Queen's and the hope is to create not just a mood but feeling and a season as well.

Director Trousdale stressed that there is lots of humour in the play. There's an appeal for almost everyone in The Cherry Orchard. Tickets are available from the Drama desk in Theological Hall.

Popular jazz act plays Wednesday

With a one, a two and SWING and Grant Hall will resound to the trumpets, trombones saxophones and all the other instruments which form the popular Queen's Jazz Ensemble when they play their opening concert for this season at 12:30 noon and 8:30 p.m. on Wednesday 10th November. Directed by David C.M. Smith the 18 member ensemble is made up of instrumentalists who play together for the sheer enjoyment of it.

The bulk of the program will consist of contemporary jazz compositions which combine the elements of both jazz and rock. Interspersed will be selections of a nostalgic sort from the big band era which feature soloists Terry Marek, flugelhorn; Maria Cooper, trombone; and vocalist Maura McGroarty. Wednesday's performance of a new vocal quartet of Mary Picot, Dale Mieske, Gail Hohner and Ted Simonette.

Now in its fourth year, the Jazz Ensemble, which has attracted standing room only audiences at its performances will appear on Kingston Cable T.V. during the United Way Telethon early next week. They have also received an invitation to participate in a Jazz Festival at the University of Toronto in a "Battle of the Bands" with the University of Toronto Jazz Ensemble next March.

Director David Smith is well known to Kingston audiences through his involvement with popular music as Music Director of Summer payhouse performances and the Kinsmen musicals at the Grand Theatre.

Rachel Pratt. Small-town girl out to conquer the big city. Pick the winner.

The city

Large cities may not be for everyone. But to Rachel there's no place more exciting or richer with opportunities.

Maybe she is a little starry-eyed, but Rachel has a far more worrisome problem. She's on a social merry-go-round.

Her day isn't complete unless she joins her friends for some pub-crawling after work. Much too often, pubs lead to parties. She's getting too little sleep, eating poorly, and her boss now regrets hiring her.

Rachel thinks it's all a great adventure. She forgets why she first came to the city. Truth is, unless she wises up and backs away soon, small-town girl may very well wind up big-city loser.

Rachel

Large cities may not be for everyone. But to Rachel there's no place more exciting or richer with opportunities.

Maybe she is a little starry-eyed, but fortunately for Rachel, she's a realist as well.

She's made some wise choices, including her decision on drinking. Not too often, not too much, is Rachel's motto. That goes for beer, wine or spirits, no matter where she is or with whom.

The interesting thing is, her moderate lifestyle hasn't made Rachel less popular. Nor has it made the city a less exciting place. It's just making her stronger. Strong enough to win.

At the Scarecrow

Chris Kearney enjoys being on stage

Davis Eagle

If I could remember "Lazy Old Rocking Chair Ride" as played by Chris Kearney and nothing more, there'd be no problem in writing the review of his performance last weekend at Scarecrow. The song I mentioned, a Kearney original, is what might be called a contemporary folk classic; that is to say it was compelling melodically, interesting lyrically and it gave evidence of a subject matter more appropriate to folk than to rock. While carrying on in this tone might be easier, it would do a major disservice to both fairness and what Kearney was and is attempting to do with his music. This is not to say that the song I mentioned is not in some way representative of what was the case, just that there is a good deal more going on.

The thing that struck me most about Chris Kearney was his address, not just in the way he plays guitar (left-handed and backwards so that he reminds one of Bizzaro-musician), but in his dissimilarity with other folkies. Aside from "Rocking Chair Ride" and "The Letter," his tunes were definitely urban in character, and sophisticated in style as opposed to the generally country-flavoured, easy-going manner of the majority of folksingers. Possibly as a result of this his music was not easy to get into...it took for me repeated listenings and some effort to begin to appreciate what was going on.

Kearney has a strong voice and used it to good advantage although he tended to rely on a relatively limited selection of Lou Rawls-type riffs which gave a somewhat repetitive quality to the two evenings that I saw him. Also contributing to both the sameness and the comparative unapproachability of his songs was his jazz-oriented guitar work. I don't mean by this that he wasn't proficient, nor that I didn't enjoy it. What I'm trying to get at is the sense of similarity that was reinforced by his chord and rhythmic structures.

It was apparent especially on Saturday night that Kearney liked being on stage and was interested in giving a good show, and as mundane as that must sound, it has become increasingly obvious to me that these attitudes are not to be assumed to be true of everybody one sees these days...not only that, but it may be the single most important attribute of anybody pursuing a public career. As Hunter S. Thompson says, "in order to turn on a crowd, you've got to be turned on by it." As I say, "if you don't want to be there, go home."

Next week at Scarecrow there will be someone on stage who might well have been born there, if it isn't his home it is at least a mailing address. I'm speaking of Doug McArthur, who many of you will remember from his appearances in Kingston and at Queen's over the last few years. If you haven't already heard of him, ask around. His reputation is in the "don't miss him" category and in my opinion is well deserved (and I don't say that because we were almost co-owners of a sulphur mine on Crete).

At any rate, getting back to Chris Kearney, I thought it was definitely a touch of class that he concluded his show with a song by Charlie Chaplin, "Smile" though your heart is breaking. It was also in tune with the substance of his performance and with what I could judge of his character.

Theatre Passe Muraille

"Farmers Revolt" makes history come alive

by Tony Pepper

Amongst the heat and cram of midterms last week, Theatre Passe Muraille of Toronto reincarnated on the Grand Theatre's stage, its dramatization of the rebellion in Upper Canada, 1837, The Farmers' Revolt.

Many of the alternate, or so called free theatres have produced reinterpretations of Canadian history, or inactments of incidents in our history that have long been neglected. 1837, The Farmers' Revolt is such a play. Production writer Paul Salutin, using original material of the period, has created an account of the rebellion, the particular slant of which reveals with intensity the frustration of the farmer under the tutelage of the Family Compact. In a series of vignettes, action is developed, the era is portrayed, mood is created and a sense of history is restored.

1837, The Farmers' Revolt is a collective creation. No script was written either before or during the production's run. The play was entirely composed or worked out during rehearsal periods, and to a certain extent, during performances. Collective playmaking is not as well-known as other forms of theatre, but the potential of this style of drama indicates the direction theatre and especially Canadian theatre, is going.

1837, The Farmers' Revolt has a cast of five: three men and two women. Michelle Fisk, Robert Haley, Wayne Robson, William Dunlop, Elizabeth Murphy and David Paul Smith. Men play women, and women men - or animals or objects or parts of the body - depending on the needs of the scene. In one vignette, entitled "The Head", the players make a pun on Sir Francis Bond Head's surname by mimicking the features of his face with their own bodies. In another scene, "The Canadian Farmer's Travels in the U.S.A." the actors mimic railways, fields of wheat and buildings. Very few props are used in any of these portrayals. They are not needed. The actors' creativity spurs the imagination. Moreover, their versatility, their ability to weave in and out of characters, gives the impression of numbers. In the second act of the play, when the farmers are getting ready to mobilize their forces and march to Toronto, the interplay of the song Across Toronto Bay with the six scenes of mobilization not only gives a great sense of energy and excitement to the moment, but the actors appear to be more than they are. Director Paul Thompson creates an army a hundred strong from a cast of five.

The unit setting is simple in design, rough wooden slates in a v-construction which rise to a scaffold platform. A Union Jack with an outlined map of Ontario serves as a backdrop. Despite the versatility of Svetlana Zylina's set, one wishes that it had been more. The scenes, though they did not lack definition, did have problems dissolving. They did not flow evenly into each other. At times, actors were left awkwardly alone at the ends of scenes. Further stylizations in the set design could possibly have eliminated this problem.

1837, The Farmers' Revolt is a brilliant piece of drama, theatre with historical significance for a secular Canadian audience. Theatre Passe Muraille operates out of a church at 11 Trinity Square in Toronto. A script of the play is available in Rick Salutin's recent book, 1837: The Farmers' Revolt, Diary of a Canadian Play or in the Spring issue of The Canadian Theatre Review.

John Klemmer's "Barefoot Ballet" is just another easy "Touch"

by Sandy Graham

John Klemmer created something of a sensation earlier this year when he released "Touch" an album of exceptionally smooth, subtle tenor sax work. Now he has recorded a follow-up, Barefoot Ballet which is quite frankly a disappointment. It differs only superficially from "Touch" and there are only a few signs of progression invention, and at some points, even enthusiasm. The basic problem is that Klemmer seems to be all wrapped up in what he calls "the sensual flow of sound," his saxophone is secondary to the music's design. One can only conclude that the poor man is hopelessly in love.

"Touch" was a fine record on its own, a pleasing if inconsequential collection of romantic tone-poems backed by bouncing pop rhythms. I enjoyed it as a good piece of concept work, in which Klemmer revealed to us one side of his horn's emotions. I was dismayed to discover however, that Barefoot Ballet was fundamentally the same. One album in this mood is acceptable, but two does tend to get a bit tedious. Where is this man's variety? Klemmer's writing is certainly not the most inspired in the business and after 2 LP's one senses his limitations without really hearing his strengths. His charts are well arranged and feature very strong interjections from his back-up men, but suffer from weak melodic lines, often consisting of nothing more than the same three or four notes played in different combinations or at different speeds and intensities. Sadly the music does not seem to conjure up for us the images he sees, that is, the translations from his mind to paper are garbled and unclear.

Fortunately, it is his playing which distinguishes John Klemmer. There is no denying that he is one of the warmest, most expressive tenor men around. He has tremendous control over the quiet middle tones (unfortunately he doesn't venture to the extremes of his instrument very often). During faster passages for example in "Whisper to the Wind", Klemmer uses the echoplex to his advantage to reinforce some of the more notable runs and turns. His colour and phrasing enhance the lacklustre writing, creating waves of rolling, liquid sound which wash over the listener. Yet for all his competence in this mellow medium Klemmer can't convince us we are not going to drown in all the imagery. A few tracks on the album show us that Klemmer has the potential to rise above most of the material he is presently recording. He transforms Janis Ian's tribute to teenage self-pity, "At Seventeen" into a perky and confident little tune. With a strong melodic line beneath him, Klemmer finally opens up and gives a catchy, swinging delivery. His ad lib solos retain this same spirit, but the cut is marred by the recurrence of two annoying eighth notes played at the completion of every major phrase.

The next track, "Talking Hands" is surprisingly well put together for a Klemmer composition. He breaks the monotony of perpetual electric piano and drums by writing in a brilliant acoustic guitar spot for Larry Carlton. It is certainly unexpected and therefore very refreshing. Even the sax lines here are impressive. When Klemmer re-enters, he seems much more flexible and willing to experiment. He soars to both extremes and includes some satisfying two-octave drops. Some gutsy quarter note thrusts follow, which become more refined as Klemmer turns some eighth notes around each "Talking Hands" is obviously the highlight of the album, but Klemmer doesn't seem to care, for most of the album's tracks don't even compare to this one.

"Rain Dancer" comes very close to the standard of "Hands" and features some fine acoustic piano (at last!) efforts from Dave Crusin, which do a great deal toward establishing the sweet mood of a quiet rainfall. This song is much more traditional than the rest and is a welcome surprise. Klemmer adds double-tracked tenor crescendos, which lend a note of intrigue and suspense.

Barefoot Ballet is at once both boring and tantalizing. The "sensual sound" John Klemmer seeks is pretty ordinary stuff, but these bits on side two clearly show us what he is capable of. Klemmer should stick to his flute when he writes music for the love. If and when he ever comes down from the clouds, I trust he will more than do justice to the wondrous tenor sax.

Disappointments in Guelph end Queen's Rugby season

The season came to a disappointing end for the Queen's rugby teams last weekend when the Guelph Gryphons handed them two losses in the same day. In the first game of the day, the Queen's second team was dealt their first defeat in over two years. Though the score was only 6-4 in favour of Guelph at half-time, the wind advantage was used effectively by Guelph in the second half, and they were able to tally another three tries, to make the final score 22-4.

The Queen's first team, after a very optimistic start this season, were handed their third loss in a row. Uninspired play in poor playing conditions typified the game. Queen's defended well against the wind in the first half, and Guelph lead 6-0 on two penalty kicks. Queen's however was unable to kick the heavy wind to their advantage in the second half, and were only able to muster three points from a penalty kick by Nigel Costeloe. Until two weeks ago Queen's shared first place in the OUAA standings yet because of the close race in the league this year, the loss to Toronto two weeks ago snuffed the hopes of even a play-off berth. Queen's first team finished with a 4-3-1 record, which on paper has to be one of the most disappointing seasons for the Gaels since Gavin Reid began coaching. The losses to Toronto and to York were both very close contests. Perhaps next year, with a little luck (that seemed to be missing this year), Queen's will once again be represented in the finals.

The second team finished the year with a 4-0-1 record, and should provide enough talent to fill the vacancies from this year's graduates.

Both rugby teams will continue their training programs, to prepare for their upcoming encounter on ice against the Golden Gals hockey team on Monday night during Suzie-Q week.

Waterpolo men sink to 5th

The Queen's Water Polo Team travelled to Hamilton on the weekend, participating in the McMaster Invitational University Challenge Cup. This tournament, spread over three full days, is the largest tournament for university competition in Canada, with seven teams entered. The tournament was characterized as a major upset, with McMaster, perennial winners, losing first place to Western.

Queen's won these first two games rather easily. In the first game Queen's defeated University of Alberta (Edmonton) by a score of 11-2, capitalizing on a number of Alberta's mistakes, and scoring on fast breaks up the pool. In Queen's second game, Queen's defeated Carleton University 16-4, which again saw Queen's in complete control of the game.

Queen's third game was against a very strong McMaster Team, ending in a 13-4 score in McMaster's favour. McMaster, playing a very physical game, took control in the second quarter, after leading by only 1-0 in the first quarter. Because of extremely close checking, Queen's was not able to move the ball well on offence, with numerous turn-overs in the McMaster goal.

Queen's fourth game was against Western, which went on to win the tournament. Queen's, after falling behind 5-3 after three quarters, came on in the fourth quarter, to tie the game. Western was able to hold off a pressing Queen's attack, the game ending in a 6-6 tie.

Queen's finished the tournament with two disastrous games. In the fifth game of the tournament, Queen's lost to Windsor, with a score of 5-4. Queen's came up flat on a number of offensive drives, and defensive errors resulted in unnecessary goals for Windsor. It was perhaps more a mental defeat, as Queen's could not "put it together" at all for the final game of the tournament, against the University of Calgary. Playing a team which was no stronger than Windsor, Queen's was defeated 10-5. It was a very roughly played game, Queen's collecting nine of 19 major fouls, many of them the result of defensive errors or physical retaliation on the opposing players. Needless to say, the Queen's team was very disappointed with the final result in this final game.

The standings in the tournament were: Western 5-1, McMaster 5-1, Windsor 4-2, Calgary 4-3, Queen's 2-3-1, Alberta 1-5, Carleton 0-6.

The goalie in all games was Richard Grew, who played very well despite some of the scores. A large number of goals against Queen's were on penalties, Queen's taking 35 major penalties and allowing a total of 40 goals. Even though Queen's finished in fifth place, it was not outscored, with a total of 46 goals, on 29 penalties assessed to other teams.

The scoring for Queen's in its fifth place finish, was Mitch Dent with 17 goals, Peter Trebuss with 13, Dave Ardell with 8, Bob Brisbois scoring 5, Jim Frost with 2 and Graham Black with 1 goal.

Gaels tie 3-3 and lose 8-6 to Laurentian Voyageurs

Voyageurs outdesire "shinny" Gaels

by Tom Shand

Queen's Golden Gaels shinny team put on a very lacklustre show against the visiting Laurentian Voyageurs this past weekend and as a result lost three of four possible points. On Friday night, the team played to a 3-3 tie. The Voyageurs no doubt would have been satisfied to have gone home with this point and considered it a moral victory, however Gaels proved to be more than generous hosts and allowed Sudberians to also take an 8-6 victory on Saturday afternoon.

To the hundreds of fans who were let down by the performance of the home team, the Gaels should apologize. Just as we should realize the sacrifices these young men make to play hockey at Queen's at the same time I think it's about time that some of these guys should realize it's a very real privilege to be representing this university. If they feel the rewards are not worth the effort perhaps they should hang up their skates and let some of the others, who would give anything to play for the Gaels, live their dream.

Sure we would lose some talent but Laurentian proved this weekend that talent deficits can be largely overcome with desire.

The Voyageurs had only five returning veterans from last year's squad. However, their fourteen rookies, although inexperienced, never stopped trying and their hustle paid off in three points.

Gaels, on the other hand, had one third of their players hustling, one third "in another world," and one third on the injury list.

Although injuries to such key players as Willie Wing and Ned McIntyre have definitely hurt the Gaels, there was still more than enough talent to defeat the supposedly weaker Voyageurs if certain of the so-called "big guns" had responded to the challenge.

Friday night's match saw the Voyageurs come from behind three times to tie. Kevin Treacy opened the scoring with a long slap shot which surprised O'Hara who mishandled Treacy's shot into a shorthanded goal. Grothers tied it up for Laurentian before ex-Voyageur Glenn Furgoch scored from the point where the Gaels had a two man advantage.

The remainder of the scoring was done in the middle period with Earl Moulton scoring the Gaels last marker sandwiched by Laurentian goals from Melanic and Sortini. Earl "the Pearl's" goal was truly a gem as he skirted through the defence and beat O'Hara on a great second effort. The final shots were 31 to 30 in favor of Laurentian. On that one extra shot, Schell made a key save to keep the game a tie. All Laurentian's goals were from in close as the Gaels' backcheckers did not get back in time and the defence momentarily lapsed.

This same trend continued on Saturday afternoon, only this time Andy Schell did not come up with the big save. All eight Laurentian goals were from shots within twenty feet of the goal as the Laurentian players were fairly free to wander in and out of the slot all afternoon.

Gaels came out strong and led 3-0 halfway through the third period. Laurentian then scored three straight times in the next seven minutes to tie the game. Laurentian outscored Gaels 3 to 1 in the final period to provide a two goal margin of victory at 8-6.

Gael's scoring punch came from their "Hustle" line of Gary Brandt, play St. Lawrence University in an exhibition game on Thursday night at Sandles. Brandt got the hat trick including one from behind the net, while Sandles and McIntyre each scored singles. Needless to say if it hadn't been for the tremendous efforts of this line the Gaels would have been embarrassed right off the ice. Not a bad offensive effort at all for the Gaels checking line.

Chuck Hamilton matched Brandt's hat trick as he notched three Voyageur goals including the game winner and their first goal. Heale, Steve Demarco, Gasparini, Crothers and Adams all added singles for Laurentian. Laurentian outshot Queen's 38 to 29.

Gaels play most of their games on the road in second term so they had better pull up their socks quickly or else they'll be out of it before they know it.

Notes: Brian Harrington and Glenn Furcho both played well on defence but could use some help. Earl Moulton and Jay Babcock are both playing up front, largely due to the Gaels heavy casualty list. Wayne Clapp was added to the walking wounded on Friday night when he suffered a possible shoulder separation. Back-up Goalie Dave Eaton's illness has finally been diagnosed as mononucleosis. Gaels play St. Lawrence University in an exhibition game on Thursday night at Jock Hartley Arena.

Hockey Gals split weekend games

Ice Gals should be golden

by Sue Creighton

Queen's intercollegiate women's hockey got underway this weekend when the "Golden Gals" travelled to York U. for an invitational hockey tournament. Queen's, one of six other teams participating in the two-day tournament, only met two of the other teams, University of Western Ontario and McMaster.

The first game, which Queen's won 2-0 over Western, was rather slow-moving, with Queen's controlling the play throughout most of the match. Janean Gerow opened up the scoring for Queen's two minutes into the game on a pass from Betty Reid. The second goal, also during the first period, was scored while Western was sitting out a body-checking penalty by Sue Thompson and was assisted by the captain of the team, Carol Quintz Pettey. These two early goals psyched out Western's team and Queen's settled into an easy pace for the remainder of the game. This was Queen's first game of the year and goalie Sue Hall's performance in this shutout victory is to be commended.

The game against McMaster (final game of the tournament) contrary to that against Western, was very fast-paced and exciting. McMaster, last year's O.W.I.A.A. hockey champs, played a very strong, well-organized game which kept Queen's players on their toes. The final score was 3-1 in favour of McMaster, with the captain of the team, Lois Cole, scoring two of the goals and assisting on the third. Queen's was short-handed during the first goal, which is the only reason why McMaster scored in the early half of the first period. Despite efforts on both sides, no other goals were scored until the second period (which saw a goal by each team.) Queen's only goal was scored near the end of this period by Kathy (Woody) Wood and was assisted by Sue Thompson and Jane Shorten. Another goal for Queen's which unfortunately did not count was scored by a new member of the team, Pepsilina deMarco. (Apparently the puck hit both goal-posts and landed on the line.) The last goal was scored by McMaster halfway through the third period. Despite the fact that Queen's was outshot 32-18 in this game, they managed to keep the scoring to a minimum and played consistently throughout the game.

Queen's regular season begins next weekend when they travel to Western and Guelph. The team is looking for a very successful year and is expecting a large turnout for their home games on the 19th and 20th of this month.

Gaels' goalie Andy Schell left all alone to fend off Voyageurs' attack.

Adam Shoemaker places 3rd in CIAU

The "Shoe" runs superbly

Adam Shoemaker: 3rd in CIAU by Tom Shand

This past Saturday the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) cross country finals were run at Guelph, Ontario. The sole Queen's man to qualify for this highly esteemed event was Adam 'the Shoe' Shoemaker.

The Shoe qualified a week ago in London when he finished second in Ontario to Bryan Stride from Brock. Unfortunately, on that day Claus Rinne had an off-day and did not qualify for the CIAU meet at Guelph.

Shoemaker ran brilliantly again at Guelph as he fought off a very strong field to finish as the third best collegiate cross country runner in the country. Once again Stride proved to be the field's major nemesis of the field as he broke his own course record with a time of 33 minutes, 31.4 seconds.

Finishing second was 'the Shoe's' arch rival Jim Millar from Western. Shoemaker defeated Millar in 'the Ontario's' but finished 30 seconds after Jim in the CIAU meet which put him about 55 seconds behind the winner.

In relation to his race plan Adam said, "It was important to get out in front at the start because the course quickly deteriorated into narrow paths. Stride was out in front from the start and when Millar broke out, then I just kept pace with him. Eventually Millar pulled away a bit but by then I was well separated from the field in third place."

Not only was the competition tough, as the 44 competitors representing five conferences from right across the nation, but the 10,000 metre course was also very difficult. 'The Shoe' later described the course as rustic. This description not only includes the usual forests, hills-and-dales, but also, "steep ridges and cow pastures with all their added bonuses."

Weather proved to be a major factor during the race and was even more important in determining the condition of the course. The temperature at race time was a very brisk

3 C. with a stiff breeze blowing into the competitors faces in the early going. According to 'the Shoe' this was very much a factor in separating the runners. The predominant feature of the course was melted snow resulting in mud which covered about 90 percent of the run.

The only negative aspect of the race for Shoemaker was that he turned his ankle when running down a steep ridge. 'The Shoe', although limping at press time, ran courageously without regard for his injured ankle. Adam will have two weeks to recuperate before the Canadian Championships (not just collegiate) in Halifax. Both 'the Shoe' and Claus 'the Rover' Rinne have qualified for this national event.

Claus Rinne: Halifax hopeful

Gals B-Ball

Queen's Golden Gals finished off their pre-season exhibition basketball games this weekend at an invitational tournament in Guelph. Friday afternoon, Oct. 29th, an extremely powerful Concordia team proved to be more than the Gals could handle. We were soundly trounced 84-38. Friday afternoon in the second round the Gals met a London Club team. After building up a solid lead in the first half, we got a little sloppy in the beginning of the second half and as a result ended up in a 69-69 tie at the end of regulation time. Although we lost the game in a five minute overtime 76-74, (One lousy basket!) all our rookies played very well under pressure. Saturday turned out to be our best day yet even with a hallowe'en party the night before. The Queen's Gals wiped York 83-46 in their final game of the tournament.

Sorry readers for the delay in reporting. Stay tuned for further hot reports about Queen's brightest young dribblers.

Basketball Gals lose weekend games to Laurentian and Western

Coach Smith pleased with team performance

Asst. coach Neil Longhurst [standing] watches Gals every move

by Brian Clarke

The Queen's University Golden Gals got their first taste of Ontario University Athletic Association basketball action this season Friday night. Although the flavour wasn't quite to their liking it could have been more sour.

The Gals met the highly-rated Laurentian University Voyageurs, perhaps the stiffest competition they will come up against during their league schedule, and wound up on the low side of 110-88 score.

Queen's managed to almost keep pace with Laurentian, which is rated among the top-ten university teams in the country by the Canadian sports magazine "Starting Line-up", until halftime when it just trailed 46-37, but in the second half the Voyageurs effectively used a full-court press defence to the dismay of the Gals.

"They (the Voyageurs) forced us to let a lot of our guys handle the ball," said Gals coach Pete Smith. "We haven't got the experience or the ability yet to handle that."

"But they're a great team with a tremendous amount of versatility and power. I was proud of our guys for the way they played."

It's not by chance that Laurentian has developed a formidable basketball team. The Voyageurs coach, Richie Spears, has an impressive basketball background and has managed to pull together players from all across the country to form his team.

Before taking on the coaching position at Laurentian this year, Spears coached Dunson Community College of Montreal to the Canadian Community College Championship last year. Two of the players on this year's Laurentian team are from that same winning squad.

Spears himself gained quite a reputation while playing basketball. He earned the honour of the all-time high scorer for Acadia University while playing there and is one of only three Canadians to date who have been drafted by the National Basketball Association. More recently, last summer he acted as an assistant coach to Canada's Olympic team.

All of this didn't really bother the Gals however. They marched into Bartlett Gym Friday night to win a basketball game and they gave it their best shot.

From the opening jump Coach Smith tried not to do anything that might help the Voyageurs. To surprise Coach Spears, Smith included Steve Simmons, and Kim Carlton, two freshmen and therefore unknown talents to Laurentian, in the Gals' starting line-up. But both Simmons and Carlton earned their keep while on the floor.

"I have been really pleased with the way those two guys are coming along," said coach Smith. "And this is only their first year."

Simmons, playing in his first ever OUA league game, scored ten points, while Carlton played a strong game defensively.

Queen's top scorer was Sean Pritchard with 17 points, while Dave Dempster managed 12, and Henry Garbaty also got 10.

Jeff Bennett led Laurentian's scoring with 27 points, while Rene Dolecetti got 20, and Michael Heale had 16.

Top rebounder for the Gals was Pritchard with seven defensive rebounds, while Andy Boniwell got five.

Saturday night, Queen's hosted the University of Western Ontario Mustangs and was defeated 60-51, but luckily for the Gals it was only an exhibition game and won't damage their OUA record.

Western plays in the OUA West Section and Queen's, being in the East, isn't scheduled to play regular season league games against it.

It was a terrible shooting night for the Gals, who found themselves behind 28-23 at halftime, as they only scored on 29 per cent of their shots. The Mustangs made a more respectable 41.

Derek Swinnard was Queen's high scorer in the game with just 10 points, while Sean Pritchard got eight.

The Gals top rebounder was Dave Dempster who managed 10 to go along with the six points he scored.

The game's best scorer was Western's Brock Carlton, brother of Queen's freshman Kim Carlton. He hooped 14 points, while his brother Kim got six for the Gals.

Other top scorers for the Mustangs were Scott McLeod and Francis Moccio with eight points each.

Queen's will now play two league games on the road before returning for some action at home.

Suspected fraud

The Ontario Government will be continuing spot audits to check for suspected fraud in its $1,000 first-home-buyer grant program. Revenue Minister Arthur Meen said that an independent auditing firm may be hired to check up on eligible recipients of the grants. As many as 9,000 recipients have received $1,000, the first portion of the grant, that they were not eligible for.

Liberal Leader Stuart Smith disagreed with Mr. Meen who was worried that the money spent in the audits would be equal or more than the money recovered. Mr. Smith said that if the audits were not continued, millions of dollars of public funds would be kept by the ineligible recipients.

The Government has not, and will not, be prosecuting violators of the grant program but merely asks that the money be returned. According to Mr. Meen most of the ineligible recipients simply made an honest mistake in applying for the grant.

External Affairs Minister Donald Jamieson told reporters that he and the French Foreign Minister have agreed to settle the case of Greenpeace captain Dave McTaggart out of court. Mr. McTaggart has filed for damages of $125,000 from France. The damages occurred when his vessel was rammed in 1973 in an effort to stop his vessel from interfering with a French Nuclear test.

Arab agreement

Hopes for eventual peace in Lebanon were raised when the rightist military command agreed to let Arab peacekeeping forces be stationed in areas under their control. Leftist leaders have already agreed to this.

Meanwhile, guerrillas conceded that the setbacks in Lebanon may cause their leaders to come to terms with Israel. However, George Habash, a Palestinian extremist vowed to continue armed attacks on Israel. It is believed that Conservative Arab governments are trying to settle for a Palestinian mini-state in territory now occupied by the Israelis.

Cut cutting licences

A report commissioned by the Ministry of Natural Resources criticized the practice of granting cutting licences for large forest areas. The study heightens the controversy surrounding the recent granting of first rights to develop a 16 million acre area to Reed, Ltd. If conditions are met, Reed would get a 21 year licence.

The report recommends the granting of a licence for 15 years. This licence would be subject to a review at five year intervals and, if approved, the licence would remain in force for 15 years after the review. Mr. Armon, author of the report, writes that the end of exploitable forests in Ontario is in sight and that significant increases in yield will result in destruction of the capacity of the forest land.

Election delay

Last week the Government of India introduced legislation that would postpone the national elections for a year. They are presently due to be held next March. This bill would cause the second postponement of elections since a state of emergency was declared by Prime Minister Indira Gandhi 16 months ago. Ms. Gandhi said that "the energy of the people should not be dissipated" by

Costly trips

Transport Minister Otto Lang has spent over $740,000 of tax money on government flights since 1973. The majority of the flights were "on Government business" according to Mr. Lang's parliamentary secretary, Marcel Roy.

Mr. Lang has been using a Government Jet Star for most of his trips. A round-trip from Ottawa to Saskatoon (Mr. Lang's home riding) costs about $7,000 in the Jet Star, compared to $412, first class, or $274 economy, via Air Canada commercial flights.

New limits

Canada has given notice of the establishment of a 200-mile limit on January 1. External Affairs Department officials announced the fisheries limit in the Arctic would be extended to 200 miles on March 1st. The new limits will bring 502,000 square miles of the Atlantic and 128,000 square miles of the Pacific under Canadian control.

The extensions are subject to negotiation with the United States, Denmark and France where boundaries conflict. A possible follow-up to the extension of the fisheries limit is the extension of the 100 mile pollution zone to 200 miles.

Shorties

Since July officials working at Montreal airports have seized over three hundred and thirty pounds of live snails being illegally imported. The snails are a curse here since they destroy gardens and fruit farms.

Prostitutes in Madrid would like to see their profession legalized, and they have threatened to make public the names of clients who hold high posts in the government if authorities do not proceed with the legalization.

Correspondents

Eighty-seven residents in Picton's Prince Edward Heights complex will have something more to look forward to in the near future. Padre Kidney has established a pen-pal system in the area, and has invited interested people, especially those who are middle-aged and who have raised families, to start a correspondence with one of the mentally-retarded residents. Since many of the residents cannot write or read, counsellors will help them read their mail and reply to it. The program should fill a real need, in that the mentally-retarded often have no families and few friends, and many community members also need friends, especially if they have raised a family who have grown up and left home.

Underwater

Last July the marine museum of Kingston opened officially in a new location in the limestone building which used to house the machinery for working the dry docks gates. The curator, Miss Rushbrooke, takes special interest in underwater diving and has gone as far away as Australia, Fiji, and the Moorea Islands on diving expeditions.

The museum itself was started to house the objects found in wrecks by local divers. Many have been found by Miss Barbara Carson, a Kingston diver most interested in marine history. She has dived extensively in the area, especially around Main Duck and False Islands.

Uranium

Hopes of finding uranium have led two mining companies, Groundstar Resources Ltd., from Toronto and Mid-East Developments Ltd., from Calgary to make an expensive gamble to find marketable amounts of uranium near Sharbot Lake.

The area being explored is in northern Frontenac County, in Oso, Olden, and Palmerston townships. Groundstar has bought a 73-claim property, and Mid-East has leased 1,100 acres of land in the area. The latter company has made line cuttings totalling sixteen and a half miles, and has mapped the area in its geological detail, as well as conducting ground radiometric surveys. Right now five thousand feet of test holes, spaced two hundred feet apart, are being dug to determine uranium ore swells. A lot of guesswork is involved here to determine the length, width and depth of the rock containing uranium.

A retired postmaster, William Harvey, prospected on his land in the area in 1956 and discovered uranium. More prospectors have since come to hunt for the ore with spectrometers and geiger counters. Major mining companies have shown some interest in the area but it is the smaller companies who are carrying out the Panelists agree on worth of education, but

Colleges called 'bourgeois haven'

by Denis Champagne

"A university education is worth it", according to the panel of discussants who gathered at Dunning Hall to participate in a forum which was the final event in the National Student Day activities at Queen's on Tuesday evening. The panel members, chaired by Principal R.L. Watts, was made up of Prof. Laurier Lapierre of the History Department at McGill University, Professor Lars Thompson of the Queen's Faculty of Education, former Queen's principal Dr. J.A. Corry, and Mr. A. McCallum, a member of the Ontario Council of University Affairs, were in general agreement that a university education is of benefit to society as a whole and the students involved.

"If Canadian society can offer the many millions of dollars it spent on the parade of jocks in Montreal, it can certainly afford to put ample funds into education", Professor Lapierre said in reference to the Canadian Olympics. The former co-host of the controversial CBC television program, "This Hour Has Seven Days" and a frequent contributor to CBC radio and television programming, contributed many interesting and lively comments to the discussion which were welcomed by the audience with corresponding applause.

Professor Lapierre suggested that universities should be made more generally accessible to society and should "stop from being a bourgeois haven. A civilised society is an end for the university and the question to ask yourselves as students is whether you are civilized men and women." He expressed no concern for how many degrees universities bring forth, but rather concern for the

Wrote of Harry Truman, Miller gives plain speaking

by Colin Brown

You know, both Presidential candidates claim to have read my book, "Plain Speaking," remarked Merle Miller. Jimmy Carter bought the hard-cover edition. After the laughter from the audience died he added with a smile, "They also tell me that he read it without moving his lips."

Merle Miller, veteran journalist, broadcaster, novelist and author, former editor of "Harper's" magazine and "The Saturday Evening Post" addressed a small group of students and faculty in Watson Hall Wednesday afternoon. The theme of the talk, arranged by the English department, was "American Literature in the 1970's", but the small group fortunate enough to hear Mr. Miller received much more than an academic lecture.

For two years now Mr. Miller has been hard at work on a new book about Lyndon Johnson, and he was full of anecdotes and comments about the former President. "One thing I know about him for sure is that he never read a book in his life," he offered. "He was a political man, who spent the last thirty-five years of his life in Washington, D.C. On the night of one of his birthdays, there were a lot of telegrams, as usual. One was from Jack Benny - with the inevitable request that his message of good tidings be tax deductible on the bottom line. When showed the telegram, he just stared at it blankly and said, 'Who's Jack Benny?' Later, after his retirement, he asked his daughter and son-in-law where they were going for the evening as they left the ranch one night. "Oh, into town to see a movie and then out for a pizza," came his daughter's reply. "Really?" said L.B.J., "What's pizza?" Now how do you describe a pizza?"

Miller remarked on how sad it is that there are so few novelists in North America today. "With 300 million people there are maybe one hundred who can get by with novel writing as an occupation. And they all live in southern California. Now there's nothing wrong with that, but as one old comedian used to say, 'It's a great place to live, if you're an orange'."

"American literature is in a very precarious and shaky condition," he added. "Robert Frost was the last man to make a living out of selling poetry, unless, that is, you call Rod McKuen a poet. Literature, in my mind, is a bit like that old saying about women - they're always sick, but they never die. Right now literature is sick."

During the talk Mr. Miller read quotes from Margaret Atwood as well as Albert Camus. "I've spent a lot of my time researching and writing about politicians," he pointed out. "And I find that we writers have something in common with them: a concern for the welfare of our society, which is what motivates us in the first place."

Merle Miller presented an hour of fascinating comment and discussion which kept the audience on its toes - like Harry Truman's peppery remarks in his book, "Plain Speaking."

I didn't need National Student Day to tell me - we're all going to hell in a hay wagon.

NSD was a good start

Congratulations are in order for the organizers of National Student Day at Queen's. Although the events and the well developed workshop discussions were attended in disappointing numbers, organizers Bob White, Hugh Christie and Kathy Wood, who were chiefly responsible for NSD at Queen's, accomplished a formidable task well.

Universities in Canada face many problems at this juncture in their collective development. Rumoured cutbacks in funding, if realized, will lead to not only the rapid unionization of many more university faculty associations, including Queen's, but to even larger classes, and thus depersonalized teaching and a general depreciation in the quality of higher education and its physical environment.

Universities, we suspect, are being compromised in federal-provincial cost sharing programmes for, perhaps, a better health care package in the provinces. The governments should be reminded strenuously at this critical time of the value to Canada of our post-secondary institutions. National Student Day here (which we are pleased to say would more appropriately have been called National University Day) provided a forum for discussion of the problems we presently have to solve. We have articulated our views among ourselves and now must go on to ensure that these concerns are presented to the public sector.

Students and university administrations both have a common stake in the future fate of post-secondary education. No interest group, be it the Ontario Federation of Students, the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada, The National Union of Students, the Council of Ontario Universities or whatever should at this time be in conflict with another (The OFS and NUS should lift their ridiculous boycott of the AUCC). Student groups should seek strong alliances with their natural partners.

At our level, this university can do little more than persevere in its attempt to convey to the general public its value in terms of societal development both at a practical level (the advancement of knowledge and technology through research) and at an abstract level (the investment in human resources).

National Student Day was a good start to the flow of information which must be encouraged if the concerns expressed last Tuesday are to be reassured.

We would recommend that similar activities to those which took place last Tuesday be conducted annually during University Day in October.

Like it is & the press

Like It is magazine appeared on campus again after a summer's absence and although it may appear to be a free gift, the campus press generally has a very legitimate complaint with this publication. Last year the problem flared in the offices of Canadian University Press in Ottawa. Like It is, receiving no financial support from student contributions, is capturing valuable national advertising away from student newspapers. Surviving on advertising from clients such as Molson's and Canada Packers, the magazine may well be undermining the financial base of many members of campus press.

While we're concerned for the welfare of the several papers which suffer because of Like It is, the Journal does not share this problem thanks to the support of Queen's students and Kingston advertisers.

On the other hand the magazine is well done. It articulates a number of issues of common interest to students and does so with a depth not available to campus journalists. The magazine's ability to recruit freelance writers in Toronto gives it a decided advantage in the detailed coverage of major student topics. That the publication appears to be widely read, at least at Queen's, gives testimony to the fact that the campus press is somewhat deficient in the analysis of, say, graduate unemployment, summer employment, and the contemporary arts.

Like It is also wisely stays away from the student politico scene: the OFS NUS humdrum which most student newspapers treat in an analogous fashion to the Globe's coverage of the House of Commons.

Above all, Like It is seems relatively objective in its perspective. The Ottawa headquarters of CUP is located a few footsteps down the hall from the main branch of the National Union of Students, which, though convenient, may not be in the best interests of journalistic objectivity.

CUP this year has improved significantly. Still, the popular success of Like It is points up a void in student journalism which CUP at present is unable to bridge. Perhaps the solution lies in more personnel and research writers working for the newspaper union. Whatever the solution may be, until material of a comparable quality to that appearing in Like It is is distributed by CUP, students will have little sympathy for the erosion of our members financial stability by that magazine.

Greenpeace gives piece of its mind:

Whales face extinction

by Carole Cheslock

As part of an effort to make the public aware that whales are threatened with extinction, John Bennett, a representative of the Greenpeace Foundation will be visiting Queen's on Tuesday Nov. 16.

The Greenpeace Foundation is made up primarily of a group of volunteers known for their non-violent yet confrontative environmental protests. It was founded in 1971 to bring attention to American nuclear testing on Amchitka Island in the Pacific Ocean. Since then they have been involved in the environmental issues of the seal hunt, nuclear power plants and Minamata disease in northern Ontario.

Due to overhunting in the last 50 years, five species of great whales are now endangered species. This includes the largest animal to ever live on earth, the blue whale. This has shifted the burden of hunting onto other species of great whales, in turn rapidly depleting their numbers. According to Jacques Cousteau, a well-known authority on ocean life, "extinction of the last great whales is less than three years away."

The Greenpeace Foundation claim that the use of helicopters and sonar devices has increased the efficiency of the slaughter of whales by the Russians and Japanese.

Modern industry converts the whale flesh into cosmetics, lubricating fluid for missiles and planes and soap among other things. All of these products have cheap, synthetic alternatives.

Canada is a member of the International Whaling Commission which is responsible for setting quotas for each season's whale catch.

However the whaling fleets rarely fill their quotas indicating that they are too high to allow the whales to maintain their numbers.

A United Nations Conference in 1972 unanimously approved a proposal for a ten year moratorium on all commercial whaling. The IWC failed to adopt the proposal because of dissent from Japan and Russia, the only members that continue to hunt great whales.

The first Greenpeace Expedition to help save the whales was launched in 1975. On June 13, 1976 the Greenpeace VII, a converted World War Two minesweeper, left Vancouver with a group of Greenpeace volunteers on board to follow the Japanese and Russian whaling fleets. The Foundation considers the mission successful since the Russians discontinued the hunt each time they came in contact with the Greenpeace

VII. About 1,000 whales were saved in this manner. It is also estimated that the cost of the fuel used in avoiding encounters with the Greenpeace decreased the Russians' profit from the whale hunt.

John Bennett, from the Toronto branch of the Greenpeace Foundation, will be presenting films and a talk on the whale story at 8pm in Stirling D. A discussion will follow.

Lederman talks about constitutionality of Anti Inflation

by Pat Delaney

Professor Lederman of the Queen's Faculty of Law spoke last Monday night in the first of a series of seminars on the Political Economy of Canadian Federalism, on the subject of continuing constitutional dilemmas and the significance of the recent Supreme Court decision on the constitutionality of the Anti-Inflation legislation.

In the view of Professor Lederman, the Supreme Court ruling in favour of the federal government was important in two respects. Firstly, it represents a further clarification of the clause of the BNA Act under which the federal government can legislate for the "peace, order and good government" of Canada. The justices enlarged the "emergency" doctrine which gives the federal government the right to take on fairly sweeping powers in a clearly defined period of emergency, to cover peacetime as well as wartime crises.

Secondly, the admission of economic briefs and expert economic opinions as extrinsic evidence provides a precedent for vastly widening the range of information which the justices can use in ruling on matters of national significance.

In the next seminar of the series, November 16, Professor Peter Leslie of the Department of Political Studies will speak on aspects of dominion-provincial fiscal relations.

Action for Ecology

by John Young

"What can teachers do about Environmental Abuse?" Students were given a practical demonstration that teachers can be innovative and survive in the classroom, at a seminar held at McArthur on Wednesday afternoon. Jeff Peters, who graduated from McArthur in 1975 and is at present teaching at Sydenham High School, outlined a program that he had introduced at the school to teach some basic environmental values. This was followed by some comments from Professors Bert Horwood and Joel Loken of the McArthur Faculty, and the seminar ended with a showing of the film "The New Alchemists" and some discussion.

For twenty minutes Jeff Peters entertained the audience with a presentation of the slides and music that he had used in introducing this program. Carefully chosen slides showing the beauty of the environment and the damage that man is doing to it merged with a commentary made up of equally carefully chosen contemporary music. Having made this presentation Jeff Peters went on to outline a follow-up activity that had involved the students clearing up garbage around the school and within the village. In this way they had not only learnt some basic environmental values but had also applied their learning to a practical situation in their community.

Commenting on the program outlined by Jeff Peters, Professor Bert Horwood, author of "Inquiry into Environmental Pollution" and "Networks", praised the approach for providing "a motivational turn-on" and then translating it into action by involving the students in cleaning up the local area. He went on to express the hope that the program would not stop at a superficial look at the symptoms, but would take the students deeper into the subject by looking closely at the causes of environmental abuse.

Cabinet response described as receptive, congenial, non committal

by Annette Nicholson

The executive of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) met Tuesday, National Students' Day, with members of the Ontario Cabinet. In a press conference in Toronto following the meeting, the OFS spokesmen called the response of the Cabinet receptive and congenial, though non-committal.

Present at the meeting were Cabinet members Margaret Birch, Terry Jones, Harry Parrott, Minister of colleges and universities, Carol Vaughan, Assistant to Parrott, and Doug Wright. The OFS was represented by Information Officer Allan Golombek, Chairman Murray Miskin, and executive members Jack Gazan and John Doherty.

The OFS presented their declaration of principles to the Cabinet made several recommendations, and discussed such issues as the expected tuition fee hike, differential fees for foreign students and other student concerns, such as unemployment. The OFS recommendations included student representation on all decision-making bodies and advisory councils; increased funding to restore the former high standards of education and to meet operating costs, a freeze on tuition fees to guarantee the accessibility of university education and that differential fees to foreign students be removed.

The OFS and the Cabinet discussed the Fiscal Managements Act, which an agreement with the federal government providing for university funding and due very shortly to expire. No agreement to replace the Act has yet been found although Ontario would like to substitute the present arrangement with a system when Ontario funds the universities through a share of income tax credits. OFS is prepared to go along with this as long as at least the current level of funding is maintained.

The Cabinet said that despite OFS opposition to differential fees for foreign students, it is committed to the plan which is to begin in January 1977.

At the press conference OFS reported on the events of National Students' Day and called the day a success. Over 20,000 students actively participated in Workshops and forums on campuses throughout Ontario.

Campus Comment

by Elizabeth Klinck

This week, Campus Comment asked students to comment on whether or not they felt National Student Day was a success. Questions included "Did you feel that there were some areas that could be improved in future Student Days?" and "Did you find the events worthwhile?"

Debra Sigler

Deb, (Arts '78) thought that the idea of a National Student day was "really good." "Those who participated had to think about their contribution to the university and society as well as what they want to do when they get out." Deb felt that most of the workshops were "interesting...I think that most people enjoyed them and found them worthwhile."

She suggested that "the specific aims of the day should be made a little clearer...they should have said what the day was meant to accomplish. Certain elements were lacking...it wasn't totally comprehensive." Deb concluded by saying "the day should be repeated...it was thought provoking."

Phil Wood

"Basically, National Student Day was too one-sided...there was too little emphasis on the social context of the educational system." Phil (Graduate Studies-Politics) commented that "there was too much protest on the fact that the middle class student has to pay an extra $175 I would have liked to have seen an extra emphasis on the fact that working class people have to support an educational system which discriminates against them in terms of the individual use of educational facilities."

Phil felt that National Student Day "didn't do anything to lighten anyone else's burden...it will create more solidarity among students, but that in itself is irrelevant. Student protest must not remain within the walls of the university."

Reid Hart

Reid (Arts '79) felt the National Student Day "should have involved the community more than it did...students are more aware of how they feel about the university community, but the day did not make the general public any more aware of the students' goals or achievements." "One of the goals of the day was to give students an opportunity to express themselves to the outside community...this may have happened, but I am unaware of it having been achieved as yet."

He concluded by saying "they tried to do too much in too little time...there were a lot of major issues being discussed in smaller groups, but there wasn't a unifying force behind it all."

Barbara Crook

Barb (Arts '79) felt that it was "rather unfortunate that there were people who were totally oblivious to the fact that there was anything out of the ordinary going on." She felt that it was "a good idea to have National Student Day...there was a lot going on that was of interest to Queen's students I hope the attendance was better at some of the workshops than the one that I went to, because a lot of people put time and effort into preparing for them." Barb concluded by saying "I started thinking about why I was here, and if other individuals had to stop and think, then the day was a success...whether or not they took part in the activities."

OSAP is inadequate

by Lyse Doucet

With the reality of rising tuition fees and decreasing government grants, "University Accessibility" and "Who pays and why" were chosen as topics for discussion during National Students' Day. At a workshop conducted by Kathy Grant, AMS Researcher, Peter Lane, former External Affairs Commissioner and OFS Executive Member, debate was centered on the questions of university entrance, the difficulties of lower-income students, and government responsibility in education.

In her report, Miss Grant was most concerned with the situation of the lower-income student. She stressed the need for greater availability of grants and scholarships. This responsibility, she felt, should be borne by society as well as by the government, as in the end corporations and consumers would benefit.

Higher education "should be a right, not a privilege" said Mr. Lane. "Besides providing upward job mobility, it is meant to develop the student's skills." Mr. Lane praised Britain's system of free tuition and spoke of the inadequacies of OSAP, which fails to recognize that the cost of living constitutes a major part of a student's financial state. In answer to a question concerning the importance of government spending in education, he claimed one couldn't rate it as more or less important than any other program. Both he and Miss Grant, however, spoke of the need for "universal accessibility" to higher education.

Much of the questioning by the audience dealt specifically with the depressed job situation students are facing upon leaving university. "It is a mistake," answered Professor Thompson, "to expect anything more out of the university than what it immediately offers."

Universities were sold on the wrong grounds in the 1960's, Principal Watts elaborated, in order to justify the increase in public expenditure desired resulting in the public being given only a partial justification of what universities were all about. "We are now getting the backlash of having sold universities on being job fulfilling institutions only," he stated.

According to Dr. Corry the long term needs of society can best be filled by the establishment of many centres of independent thought and action, "and where else can you better produce these but in universities."

The former principal, who has spent approximately fifty years in and about universities stressed the importance of the public accountability of universities because of the large amount of public funds which universities require to operate. "Any institution that gets the large amount of public money that universities get and thinks that it can stay out of the public eye is ridiculous," he stated in reference to the recent controversies over the quality of university education.

Mr. McCallum, a machinist at Stelco Ltd. in Hamilton, and an active participant in labour union activities emphasized the importance of the labour movement's fight to make education universally available. "Labour is in the education business and we are in it to stay," he said, "because we think your education is well worth it."

The Canadian Labour Congress conference held in Quebec City this past October urged all affiliated unions to ask for paid education leave at whatever levels employees want to take it. "Labour is involved in a fight to improve the educational levels for the whole of society because we feel it is important that society be civilized."

AMS President Jamie Avis expressed discontent in his closing remarks for the evening with the small turnout of approximately one hundred students, but felt that in spite of this the evening had been a success.

NSD at Queen's

National Student Day activities took place in Mackintosh-Corry Hall last Tuesday but were not an outstanding success. Perhaps the snow kept people away, or perhaps they just didn't care. The question left with the people who organized and paid for it now must be: "Was it worth it?"

NDP will abolish tuition

by Tim Greenwood

If the NDP gains power in this province, they intend to abolish tuition, a policy which would be financed by increasing the tax on corporations by 1 per cent. George Benson, a student representative for the NDP explained that corporations should be expected to foot the bill as they profit by snapping up university graduates.

This statement was made at the National Student Day workshop on education policies where the student representatives from the provinces political parties discussed the educational policies of their respective parties. John Burbidge the PC representative explained his party's opposition to free tuition by pointing out that society's resources are limited, and that students as beneficiaries of education should be expected to cover some of the costs. He further noted that the government's decisions as a democratic body necessarily reflect the will of the people. Mr. Burbidge also made known his party's opposition to universal accessibility if it meant quality would suffer for the sake of quantity.

The liberal representative Jay Myers felt that the PC's had made the cutbacks in education as a result of the large financial deficit they had incurred while in office. Mr. Myers said that if the Liberals gained power they would examine whether tuition was necessary, and also inside improvements in OSAP. He felt that the federal Liberal party's plans for subsidizing and creating jobs for students this summer helps to prove that the Liberal policy is "the most responsive and realistic in relation to the needs of the students."

George Benson from the NDP criticized the PC government's education policy, pointing out the high rate of student summer unemployment and the unreasonably small percentage of students from low income families in universities. Mr. Benson felt his party, with its promise of free tuition presents the only "just policy."

Rectorship

Chochla stresses personal experience

by Giles Gheron

Moe Chochla seeks to "make the rector more effective" as the student representative to the Board of Trustees. In an interview with the Journal, Chochla, one of the contenders in the upcoming rector election, emphasized that the rector must "get a firm grasp of student problems" in order to act "as a coordinating influence between, and a resource person to, different groups on campus."

Chochla deemed "a first hand working knowledge of all levels of administration at the university" to be essential to properly "take care of student concerns and problems", - an integral aspect of the rector's job, according to Chochla.

For Chochla experience is the key to good performance as rector. And he has "been involved at every level of student government" at Queen's - as a senator both for Applied Science and Law, as AMS Education Commissioner, as a member of both the Applied Science and Law Faculty Boards, as well as several AMS, Engineering and Senate Committees. Thus he feels he can represent student interests "effectively" to the Board of Trustees.

Chochla aspires to the rectorship because he is anxious to "help develop Queen's as an institution with a superior academic environment." He states that as rector he would hope to foster discussion among students and faculty on the process of teaching and learning, both of which "need constant evaluation." Chochla feels that students can do much to contribute to their environment and it is such a contribution which he hopes to be able to encourage and then articulate to the Board of Trustees.

Although Chochla will next year be in his third year of law school he feels he can simultaneously perform the role of rector "effectively."

"I've done enough things in the past and remained a full time student," he noted.

Chochla tends to downplay the ceremonial aspect of the job, claiming that "really anyone can sit on a stage," but he did admit to the importance of being able to express oneself well, especially on occasions of "pomp and ceremony", asserting, however, that he had no worries in this area.

He said that his experience to date in student affairs has shown him the importance of tact in dealing with all levels of the university.

Mayor Speal - don't build walls

Kingston Mayor George Speal gave Queen's a tip of the hat Tuesday in remarks to students assembled in Macintosh-Cory for kick-off of National Students Day.

"Kingston is a much richer city and we are a much richer people because of the presence of the University in our community." The involvement shown by the University students in the community is a great value to the city of Kingston, Speal said.

"My great fear is that you will come and go from your four years here and not realize that there are 60,000 other people around you. The University and the town must grow together."

"Social service involvement by Queen's over the past few years should not be repaid by mere thanks from the Mayor. The number of people who have gone out over the years to help our senior citizens, to landlords - actual problems where you have put into practice what you have learned."

"I want to thank you and implore you not to build a wall around this institution. Don't forget to go out and use Kingston as a guinea pig for what you have learned in your institution

Pepper - immediacy is important

by Rob Reynolds

In determining what the terms of reference are for Rector, aspirant Tony Pepper stated that it was "Up to the individual to define the role as he sees it."

In a Journal interview, Pepper elaborated upon the difficulty of defining the role of Rector by stating that it is "a function that vacillates between the AMS and other bodies - so unique is the position."

The problem in clarifying the position of Rector centres around By-Law 17 of the AMS Constitution, where the sole purpose of the Rector is defined as being the "student's representative to the Board of Trustees."

Pepper holds the past Rectors, Allan Broadbent, Gary Cannage and Bruce Trotter, responsible for the lack of definition in the office for, as he said "Defining it (the position) should be the job of the Rector."

As the only student on the Board of Trustees, the body responsible for Queen's, Pepper sees his role as that of a representative rather than a delegate of the students. According to Pepper, "As I must synthesize the material and make the decisions, I speak for myself." He was, however, quick to assert that he would take the problems of the student to the Board of Trustees.

The question of student accessibility to the Rector has been one stressed in recent years. In assessing the failure of past Rectors in this regard, Pepper stated that they "got into the position and stopped, they didn't get involved." To correct this situation, Pepper professes that "the Rector's office should be wherever the Rector is, the cafeteria, on the street or even on a bus." Pepper would, however, maintain an office with an answering service and mailbox.

Throughout the interview Pepper reiterated that the most important quality of the Rector is "Immediacy", that is "to make yourself available."

In stating his qualifications for the position, Pepper states, "I am not a politician", but that you, "don't have to be a political activist to be Rector."

Tony Pepper has been an organizer for the 1975 Arts and Science Orientation Program, member of a Search Committee to find a new head for the History Department, production assistant for many Drama Department productions and is presently a Don in Jean Mance Residence.

Discuss the issues before you in a way of openness, exploration and coming to a conclusion which you can offer to society. Conclusions which will make an improvement in the quality of life for those who come after you."

National Students' Day must not be a confrontation, Speal said, but a time for students to get to know themselves.

"People are still left with the bad effects of the revolutionary 60's. You have an obligation to show that you have a useful and important role to play in society as students," the mayor said.

AMS president Jamie Avis said students must involve media and the public in National Students' Day and its results.

"It's the first time students across Canada have set aside some time where it will be possible to focus on the problems, goals, and ambitions of the university as a group," Avis said.

He told students that themes of student unemployment, universal accessibility and quality of education were at the centre of National Students' Day in Ontario.

Canada Campus Notes

UBC may be closed indefinitely

VANCOUVER [CUP] - A Liquor Administration Branch (LAB) inquiry could close the University of British Columbia student pub, The Pit, indefinitely, LAB general manager Vic Woodland said Nov. 1.

The inquiry will examine all liquor outlets in the student union building, including the administration-run pizza parlour, for lack of control within the facilities, infractions of the licensing laws and any problems for the community as a result of excessive drinking, Woodland said.

RCMP Sgt. Al Hutchinson who acts as local liquor inspector sparked the inquiry with a report on the pub's "questionable activity" and vandalism related to drinking there.

"The report was an adverse description outlining the shabby operation of the student drinking facilities at the university," Woodland said.

"If the investigation supports the report's findings, there is no alternative to suspending the drinking privileges."

The UBC student representative assembly voted Oct. 20 to close the pub for one month, acting on a recommendation from the student administrative commission which was aware of Hutchinson's report.

If the LAB refuses to renew the license when it expires Jan. 1 the student society cannot contest the decision.

However student administrative commission member Herb Dhaliwal said Nov. 1 the pub could be reopened in about a week with major changes in the operating procedures.

Students will be able to buy beer tokens as always, but will now be served by waiters, he said. The selection of beer will probably be cut down.

Having 10 brands of beer for sale would be too much work for the waiter, so The Pit will probably sell only draft and cider, Dhaliwal said.

Another proposed change is reducing the capacity of The Pit to 350 from 400.

Guelph students still awaiting loans

GUELPH [CUP] - Over 100 students at the University of Guelph are still without the Ontario student aid they applied for last May and June, according to the campus student awards officer.

Gary Davidson said the number is down from 500 students at the end of September who had not received their awards under the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) because of the usual computer foul-up.

Ontario minister of colleges and universities Harry Parrott admitted the OSAP computer program, which for the past three years has meant delays in application assessments, is "totally useless" because the ministry hired the job out.

Parrott said in the legislature recently he will personally attend to any student who might be forced to leave school because of student aid delays.

Davidson said even under this system it would still take Parrott 15 days to work on the personal request while other loans are neglected and the system becomes even more fouled up.

Parrott said the ministry is "trying to get the computer program completely within our control" and has hired 10 people to work on the program.

Women academics last in line for tenure

WINNIPEG [CUP] - Cutbacks in educational funding keep women academics at the bottom of salary scales and put them last in line for tenure according to the University of Manitoba representative to the western regional meeting of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT).

Lorna Sandler said because so many professors are already tenured, most of them male, women are having a harder time getting and securing tenure as money for salaries decreases.

Dealing with the status of women in western universities, the Oct. 21-23 conference, failed to find a solution to the problem she said. Sandler was pessimistic about a recommendation that university departments give preferential treatment to women applicants.

Present tables differentiate on the basis of sex, and assume women will outlive men resulting in a lower yearly pension for them.

This discriminates against 84 per cent of women on pensions Sandler said because studies prove they don't live longer than men. Those who benefit, she said, are insurance companies who save money through the arrangement.

CAUT already endorses unisex tables but the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) has refused to support them, Sandler said.

She said the U of M faculty association status of women committee is writing a report on unisex tables and will be asking the AUCC to include them in next year's association contract.

National Student Day is over

Where were you?

Dear Editor:

Now that National Student Day is over, we can really see how concerned students are "To learn for ourselves", "To consider", "To show concern" were key phrases in the NSD resolution passed by the National Union of Students Concerned?

Where were the people who were supposed to fill the workshops? Where were the discussions at lunch tables? Why wasn't Dunning packed for the wrap-up panel discussion in the evening? Why, indeed? Because it's obvious to me and to many others who attended the workshops that the majority of Queen's students don't care at all.

There was no lack of information in the form of pamphlets, posters, Journal and Lictor articles - even Golden Words published a program. There are about 10,000 students on this campus - surely not all of them were writing midterms or attending classes all day.

The organizers of NSD are to be congratulated for a sterling job. It is no easy task to create workshops, invite speakers and do the other jobs which must be done. Those of us who attended the workshops enjoyed the discussion immensely and anyone who listened to Laurier LaPierre or any of the other speakers in Dunning can testify to a very rewarding debate.

NSD was supposed to unite Queen's students with common education problems under the banner "Is University Education Worth it?" Well Queen's, if you don't give a damn about your own education, what do you care about?

Jonathan Spencer

AMS oligarchal

Dear Editor,

We find it highly ironic that the November 9th issue of the Journal should contain numerous references concerning NSD, and at the same time publish an article stating that the policy concerning free tuition will not necessarily reflect the results of the upcoming referendum concerning the matter.

The purpose of NSD was to stimulate interest in the student populace to become involved and active. The AMS then turns around and removes one such vehicle for participating in the decision making process of this university. To neglect the views of the referendum because "the AMS has already taken a stand (and) if students did not support the AMS, it might become an embarrassing situation... (if) it would have to publicly reverse its position on the issue", is both hypocritical to its stand on NSD as well as severely undermining the credibility of the AMS as the representative voice of the students.

It appears the AMS is becoming oligarchal in executing its functions and is more concerned with maintaining its own status quo. Some of the decisions the AMS have recently made have been questionable as to whether they were justifiable, but to blatantly neglect the views of the people before they have even been expressed is clearly a violation of their elected positions.

Many of the questions raised in the NSD and on the AMS page of the Journal could also apply to the present conditions of the AMS. Perhaps we should have a Queen's Student Day, which like NSD, would allow us to voice our discontent, but this time at the bastardization of Queen's "responsible" government.

Susie Cow Week

Dear Editor:

I just got wind of this here "Susie Cow Week." Me and Mabel (she's my purebred Holstein) were thinking of stepping out this next week and taking part in the festivities. Now you know, Mabel ain't your ordinary purebred Holstein, no sir. She is one of those here liberated individuals. Why you know she don't even need a bull no more, nope, she can do it all by herself in this here new process called artificial insemination.

Mabel ain't happy about being liberated, nope, she told me that it ain't what it's cracked up to be. In fact she often comments on the fact that there ain't nothing like a good bull.

Mabel asked me to pass on a few words of friendly advice to the liberated girls of Queen's. Mabel recommends that you girls find yourself a good bull and see if he can straighten things out for you.

'Farmer Derek'

Learning the hard way

by David Gay

I once sat down for a cup of tea in a friend's house and noticed a poster on his wall. It read, "university is an encounter with yourself. If you do not find your time here disturbing or difficult you have missed its purpose."

Although I am a university student I found little reason to commit this saying to memory and simply greeted it with the same paranoid giggle I use to dismiss any discernible unpleasantness. Though it is not broken down in the tuition allotment along with C.F.R.C. and student activity fees, I presumed that firmness of character and soundness of principle come part and parcel under the $798 I have been paying each year for young adulthood.

It was soon after this that my presumptions were annihilated in a true test of character. You see it was this time last week that I found myself one hour away from the deadline for submitting my column without a single idea in my head. I considered typing out "Stephen Leacock's Oxford," or a chapter from Kurt Vonnegut's Breakfast of Champions and signing my name to it. But there was always the chance that some literate student might recognize it. After all, I had my reputation to think of. Then again, who would listen to a literate student, he's part of a university group.

My mind wandered back to first year. It was then that a fellow I knew was holding weekly 'Garner Ted Armstrong' parties. The format was simple; just crack a case of two-four and listen to Garner Ted demolish the theory of evolution. He did this by the method of counter proposal. Garner Ted wanted to know how many squirrels jumped out of trees to a certain death before the first, fully evolved flying squirrel took to the air. For that matter, how many Boeing 747's were pushed over high cliffs before the first, fully evolved jet-liner carried a load of fat Canadians from Toronto to Miami Beach?

Bolstered by the high school, Sunday morning echoes of my mother's laughter as she sat watching Rex Humbard with a big bowl of popcorn, I secured a tenuous grasp on my material and produced a column entitled "The Final Solution." It was a light-hearted look at what would happen if Queen's were changed into a Kentucky-fried Chicken Bible College in order to solve its financial problems. Ha, ha, such fun. (Actually, some institutions will do anything for money, no kidding.)

I'm sure none of you read "The Final Solution" but that's alright, just assume it to be ignorant and offensive for the purposes of today's article. Actually I was quite pleased with it. So was my house-mate Will. Above all, I firmly believed in and staunchly supported the micro-ounce of principle Will and I managed to wring from it (We each took an end and gave the looseleaf a full turn to the right.) Such fun.

But the next day, a prominent member of the Journal staff brushed past me outside the library and I knew that all was not well. I dropped my books and ran after him, grabbing his coat tail, begging for the tiniest ounce of praise, letting him drag me through the freshly painted socialist crest which was ruined as a result. He opened his mouth to speak and all I could see was a vision of his parents sitting around a Christmas fire reading old copies of The Plain Truth. I have no idea what he said but I'm sure he denounced me and my works for all time on account of "The Final Solution." Needing comfort, I found my friend John whom I go to church with. John had read the article.

"Going to church this Sunday?" he asked.

"Of course, John," I said.

"Have a good time," he replied.

So this was it, my appointment with destiny. Damned to roam the Campus, friendless and despised, cut off from the praise of men. Where does a man go when he is cut off from God, man and Nature? The pub, certainly. Yet even there I was unwelcome. Instead of offering me a friendly service, a large, rugged, shirted, painter-panted waiter said, "Care for a porridge sandwich, you jerk!" and walked away. Cut off in the pub! Surely this was the twilight of my fortunes.

I decided to walk to the Plaza by way of Portsmouth village lest I should be pinned down in a cross-fire between Newman House and the Skylight Dining Room. My footsteps lay heavy on the cold pavement as I made my way down the street. I was greeted by my ex-friend Tim, a highly intellectual fellow who had read the column. We scuffled for a moment until he pinned me. I pleaded with him to let me up because I was wearing my sister's coat, but he was without mercy.

"So," he demanded, "utter crap this time."

"Does it really deserve to be called crap?"

"No, but that's the baddest word my parents permit me to use. By the way, do you know what you've done? Do you? You've undermined the whole post-reformation concept of structured religion. You've slammed the entire premise of quasi-colonial theological stratification. You've nullified the hypothesis of secular satanic succession, modelled after the Bismark school of..."

"I wish to goodness that it had never been printed," I gasped close to tears.

"Nonsense, don't feel that way at all," he said, "it's essential to democracy that all things be printed."

This last comment pleased him best and he decided to let me up. He patted me on the back and wished me well. Celebrating the sense that he had just made out of a dialectical catastrophe. I decided to dash off before he rescued his wrath from his archetypal subconscious.

I found seclusion in the Douglas Library where I gained the composure necessary to fill out an application for transfer to RMC. Guiding the pen required both hands, and a member of the library staff assured me that she had already called an ambulance. This meant she hadn't read the article. Suddenly I was confronted by a mob. My breathing stopped, blood pressure dropped to zero and my eyes became fixed and dilated on my friend Darren who stepped forward and handed me a petition. It informed me that the undersigned 9,999 students had heard that I was feeling bad. Furthermore those that had read the article really didn't give a damn one way or another. Several had found it mildly amusing.

"You should be ashamed of yourselves," I shrieked, my face the colour of tomato juice. I chased them into the street, flinging fistfuls of books into the bushes where some lay cowering. It was more than I could bear. I had no choice. I did what all men of backbone who have stuck firmly by their principles without budging do when they are met with the hypocrisy of jellyfish even to the end. I withdrew. I have joined the French Foreign Legion which most men join to forget a bad romantic experience. I joined to forget a bad intellectual experience. I had somewhere in Canada a place called "King's" or was it "Duke's" or "Princess College?" Well whatever

Fame, Glory and Media Abuse

by Bernie Helling

Let's say that you have just organized a society-group-club-Campus organization with wide reaching aims. Your only problem is that no one on Campus, aside from a few neurotic groupies, has shown any interest in it. You need publicity, controversy and excitement to swell the ranks of your organization and put its name on the lips of every Queen's student. How?

This is a simple lesson in exploiting your local Campus media. As a rule, a university newspaper is always on the prowl for a good on-Campus issue. All you have to do is create one by writing letters.

Rule One: Beat a dead horse. A new cause is very hard to push but an old or transferred argument can be recycled time and time again.

Let's say you pick any one of the many dead horses lying rotting by the wayside, such as (just an example, of course) Susie-Q Week. What a harmless little ritual. All wholesome, regardless of their gender are bound to have fun. Why not mess it up a bit? Filthy chauvinistic male-dominated aggressive throwback! Sexist! Bring out the soapboxes and sharpen your pencils; the offal is beginning to fly.

Rule Two: Create a controversy. Write piles of letters to the university newspaper. If no one takes up the challenge, write your own opposing letters to fan the fires. Jonathan Swift, of Gulliver fame did this as a matter of practice. One day he would denounce himself anonymously as a screaming Whit, the next day as a bumbling Tory. Then he'd sit back and bask in all that reflected glory. Sooner or later, other rabid letter-writers will pick up the cause. Why use the Campus newspaper? Its easy standards, its accessibility and of course, that captive audience of mumbling students who are dying for something to talk about over their coffee. Don't feel like God's gift to controversy? That's good! To carry on such a campaign, you have to have a swelled ego, a distorted sense of values and rabid fanaticism!

Rule Three: Be utterly ruthless! Let no opposing viewpoint go unpunished. Any dissent requires another screaming, incoherent letter - you don't have to prove anything - you know you're in the right!

One of the biggest dangers to your hard-won controversy is an impartial article done on it. Such an effort could well resolve the conflict. Be ruthless! Any article, letter or editorial, no matter how favorable to you - it can even be written by one of your group - must be quashed, invalidated or slandered if it threatens to kill the argument.

Scream foul, yell sexist, foam at the mouth, get out your thesaurus of "catch words and rhetoric for all occasions" (Random House 955737-A14, $195). Yell 'til your throat is raw. Nitpick, slander, give no quarter. Go see Citizen Kane and take notes. Try to take over the newspaper. Keep that issue alive until you've put your point across. When you've run out of people to slander, retire gracefully and get ready for the next issue. Remember, the means are more important to-are the end!

One word of warning. If you are involved in the newspaper, stay away from such rabid controversy unless you want to be made a fool of in your own paper. Zealots are the most ungracious lot on this earth. If fanatics will risk their own necks for the cause, what qualms do they have about risking yours?

Virginity's a Social Disease

by Howard Smith

Over coffee we discussed virginity, the girls stressing how important that condition was to them. One said in earnest "I want to save it for my husband." "Why buy the cow if you can have the milk for free," retorted the other. My mind, reeling as if I were clubbed about the head and ears by the blunderbuss impact of such logic, struggled back to consciousness. "What year is this?" They didn't understand. To believe a woman must save certain rights for her husband implies that if she does not, he will not be pleased. The reason he will not be pleased is that by 'making it' before marriage she has become a 'used model'. This notion is a property concept - virginity describes the 'new model' status.

The term virginity applies primarily to women; insofar as it may be used to describe a man it carries different connotations, for few women are concerned about their man's premarital sex experiences. The state of 'virginity' is a relic from the days when women were overtly dealt with as chattels (pieces of property), an era when a woman's raison d'être was sexual utility. It was given by a society that thought this way, and lives on as a social disease. In subscribing to the outdated virtue of 'virtue' theory, the modern woman marches to the tune of an ancient male chauvinist drummer. Her conduct becomes a tacit admission that she is a piece of property to be lumped together with a spayed pet, a mare, a '77 model and a new potato.

The two girls I spoke with who honored virginity thought nothing of the fact that although they were waiting, their 'would-be' husbands wouldn't be. Nothing is more indicative of the malignancy of a prejudice than when those offended by it endorse it themselves. These girls actually believed their worth as marriage partners turned upon their 'new model' status. In the modern era the importance of virginity per se as a pre-condition to a marriage offer is declining - but this doesn't mean the fatuous attitudes that gave it breath have changed. The virginity concept has been transformed to a more liberal, disguised version of the same thing - namely respectability. She is not a 'used model' any more if she's slept with one, two or three boyfriends, but replace the numbers with eighteen, thirty-two or forty-seven, and you describe the contemporary 'used model'.

How many people you've screwed, just like how many people you've kissed or eaten hamburgers with is immaterial to the question of marital worth. As men have explored and continue to explore these horizons, so should women. Furthermore, the sooner women themselves reject the value of virginity or respectability as a prerequisite to marriage, the sooner men will get over believing such qualities are significant. After all, what could be more unconvincing than a smoker, who with tag in mouth, lectures on the evils of cigarettes?

Overview of God Debate (part 1)

by Paul Dalle-Molle

Now that the sparks have ceased to fly from the Howard Smith-Gord Taylor et al debate ("God Isn't Dead, He Never Lived") I would like to take this opportunity to reflect on this issue.

My initial reaction was one of pleasure that a debate of this nature was being carried on in the pages of the Journal. There is a regrettable dearth of such discussion at Queen's and, consequently, in its newspaper. The Journal is a forum accessible to everyone in the university; it should be used by members of diverse faculties, and people of varied outlooks to address issues important to everyone at Queen's. In these days of specialization and training and core courses, most of us have a narrow view of life. Our common tool of communication - the Queen's Journal - should be used more often to discuss with each other those subjects which we are all intently studying in solitude.

As for the substantive nature of this debate, my sentiments lie near those of Mr. Howard Smith. There are a number of ideas which I find especially attractive. One is the need for every person, whether consciously or not, to develop a framework of ideas upon which to base personal decisions.

This search for a philosophy is a great and beneficial human activity, but it becomes dangerous when we confuse philosophy with religion or mythology. Religions and other myth-systems have historically served to bind societies. They foster values and procedures which allow the maintenance and continuation of life under specific conditions.

Today, we need a binding value-system as much as humans have ever needed one - there is evidence that our exploitation-consumption way of living may be leading us towards extinction or, at least, catastrophe. What we need, however, is not more religion or mythology, but rather a human philosophy grounded in daily behaviour - one which is intent upon leading us to fulfill each other's basic human needs.

As with Gord Taylor, I lament the passing of the idea of sin as an integral aspect of human consciousness. In the modern, secular world we are certainly witnessing a crisis of morals. Perhaps, if our social consciousness were to emphasize the immediate, personal, human wrongdoing of those acts we call

'crime', then there would be a greater individual incentive to refrain from such actions. But it is a simplistic notion to ascribe social decay to the waning of Christian religion and its concept of sin. There are modern, systemic forces which create tremendous stress in individuals, which limit the alternatives available to people. Christianity, at least in name if not also in substance, has fostered or protected these forces in their historical rise.

Is it not natural, then, to hear demands for the abolition of the church and its daily power and money dealings, its sheer physical existence? This is especially important because the church cloaks its activities in cosmic terms and claims to present the one legitimate universal reality.

Queen's should be an apolitical university

Dear Editor:

I would like to take exception to Miss Crowe's letter defending the rights of political crest painters.

Queen's has a reputation, apparently well deserved, of being an apolitical university. I suggest this is so because most of us want it this way. Furthermore, despite vilifying fingers ever-pointing, I suggest this political apathy is good and not bad. With Aristotle's permission, I have looked into the souls of men and I have decided that we who make up Queen's are not better men nor worse than all other men, and therefore we may be edited by the lessons to be learned in other places.

One extreme is the situation that exists in my native Romania, where a mug shot of Tovareshu Ceausescu (Comrade Ceausescu) hangs in every classroom, and the walls of all educational institutions are defaced by quotations of his and of Marx (I mean "deface" quite literally. Walls, inside and out, top to bottom, are covered in posters and placards and pictures). These are merely the superficial signs of deep ramifications. For example, in Romania it is very well understood that university appointments have more to do with political orthodoxy than competence. For the student, he must write and pass an examination in Scientific Socialism, sin qua non, for admission into any university.

The other extreme exists in most of Western Europe, where the political climate is much more intense than here. In Rome, the University is covered from top to bottom, inside and out, with spray paint, crayon, chalk, posters and placards and pictures screaming out the dogma of the multitudinous political factions in the university community. Each political faction tries, in succeeding efforts, to out-do itself and its competition. With the increase in these efforts, the decrease in clean wall space, and the resultant diminution of effectiveness as a function of effort, frustration crescendos to the point where it becomes manifest in the physical destruction of the campus - I mean and stone, torn down foundations, broken railings, etc. Paris is better off, though the disfigurement is still painful to look upon. I have never seen Bonn or Berlin, but I hear the situation is similar.

I must say it is difficult to decide which of these two extremes is the more repugnant. I would like to dispense with both of them, thank you. We in Canada are in a marvellously fortunate position: how many times have we been told that concerning various social and political phenomena, we are "twenty years behind the U.S." in one thing, or "ten years behind the U.K." in another? It is almost tautological to say man does not learn from history, but we in Canada can look into our future and we thereby have knowledge, given us but denied all others, which we ought to use in the formulating and forming of our future. We need only look to Europe if we need incentive to stand fast in our resolve to maintain a strictly apolitical university.

For whom we wear the poppies

by Jim Klein

I bought my poppy Friday in the Toronto bus station from an old Legionnaire who appeared frankly surprised to see me cough up a quarter or more as payment for it. It was three hours later in a Waterloo pub that I started to wonder for whom I wore the plastic flower.

A 'rubby' approached me (something I somehow neither mind nor particularly encourage) in the local version of the 'Tap Room.' Having bummed a cigarette, the man next attempted unsuccessfully to cadge a beer. In a final attempt he glanced at the piece of red felt in my lapel and slurred "I'm a veteran, y'know." Only after callously telling him he should drink at the Legion did I realize that it may well have been precisely his war experiences that both made him what he was and brought him to where he was.

The poppy I wore, I knew then, remembered those dead in more than just the physical sense. True, annual services would be held where legionnaires stand an honor guard while, as always, we honor the lost. Lost to our memories, however, might be many living veterans who don't turn out in medals and berets—survivors, yet in many ways among the dead we purport to remember.

We are all familiar with permanently disabled hospital cases who have survived the wars. Confined to bed by missing limbs and organs or to waterfilled tubs by irreparable burn damages, they are painful to remember. Yet they are also unable to march with honor.

My friend the 'burn-out' belongs to a second group of half-dead; less obviously stricken but, if anything, more numerous. It could be that the seedy drunk I met had, in trying to give a lasting burial to several frightful years of his youth, surrendered much more of his life than he had bargained for.

The most sizeable number of veterans who don't parade are very healthy in most all physical and mental respects. They may have lost no more than the memory of a small part of their lives – specifically their years of military service – and are quite content to limit their losses to that.

Many manual laborers and professional people across our continent share one trait. They are not, though they may hold Legion cards, given to having a few Saturday-afternoon beers at the Hall. Some will say that the talk there revolves too often and too morbidly around wartime recollections

Others, in a more basic objection, hold that being alumni of one of the biggest-ever schools of hard knocks hardly constitutes positive motivation for social interaction.

Consider being a survivor of a tragic train wreck. Would you consider yourself overly sensitive or snobbish for not wishing to attend an anniversary reunion of the event?

From relatives and co-workers I have heard countless anecdotes about wartime England and the thrill of being a 'liberator.' When I asked a foreman in a pulp-mill woodyard what Normandy was like, he would allow only that he gets drunk most every June 6.

Let it not be implied that the Legion is an empty institution. The organized veteran is a welcome presence on those days when we allow ourselves to remember. The Legion is, year round, a commendable social body and a totally acceptable lobby for veterans' interests. We should, however, look beyond the dead and the marchers lest we forget many of those for whom we wear the poppies.

Erratum: Puretex at work

Dear Editor:

When I wrote the article on the Puretex Knitting Company in Toronto, I spoke of the worker's strike. In fact, the workers voted on Sunday not to go on strike, and to present a case to the Human Rights Commission instead.

In an interview with the Globe and Mail, Mr. Gary Satok, president of the company, had this to say: "I've got to see where my people are all day. I don't have time to waste fooling around." Mr. Satok himself expressed the bind he has put his workers in: "I need my workers but they need the company as well." Only before that he said, "They don't have to work here."

When jobs are scarce, how can you afford doing without your job? But do the workers need the company? Maybe Mr. Satok is wasting his time fooling himself. When jobs are scarce, you can afford doing without the companies and the bosses.

Confrontation politics

by Brian Green

As the Rhodesian constitutional conference limps along toward an untimely demise in Geneva, the sanguine expectations for a permanent and peaceful settlement that attended its opening have been decisively scuttled. Hope has diminished in direct proportion to the volume of diatribe that passes for constructive dialogue there.

The talks have been anti-climactic, to say the least; a discouraging epilogue to Mr. Kissinger's remarkable achievement of actually having engineered the event itself. It is a pointless exercise—and a hopeless one, at that—to try to attribute blame for the impasse exclusively to either faction. Culpability has to be shared equally on both sides of the conference table.

The temptation to testosterone Prime Minister Smith is irresistible. After all, his imagination and his bargaining agility are ultimately circumscribed by the parochial politics that are his natural element. Constrained to fight a rearguard action with the right wing of his party and the electors back home, he neither aspires to, nor is equipped with, the statesmanship and delicacy that such negotiations demand. Unschoolled in the fine art of compromise and gentle suasion, he is far more comfortable with the blunt rhetoric and stubborn integrity of action that the provincial farmer, which is Ian Smith's ineluctable and essential heritage—found such faithful tools in cultivating his local political demesne.

Mr. Smith's most recent announcement comprises a cogent example of just this dichotomy of good intention and clumsy performance. In asserting that the "one man-one vote" policy is nowhere nearly implicit in his concept of majority rule, Mr. Smith was articulating on behalf of a large number of Rhodesian Whites, the sincere belief that a man's right to vote should be qualified by both his level of education and his ownership of property.

The first impulse of any red-blooded North American is to naturally recoil at this brazen assertion of elitism, thoroughly imbued—as we are—with an infallible belief in the sanctity of egalitarianism. But the irony of Mr. Smith's position is that it is at the same time both eminently reasonable and intrinsically immoral.

On the one hand, it compounds the injustices of history that saw black men denied the same educational opportunities, the same access to lucrative professions, and the same freedom in the ownership of land that were traditionally reserved for Rhodesia's privileged White minority. In this perspective, the Prime Minister's proposal becomes a rankly political one, calculated to preserve non-African hegemony of the nation's already imbued power structure.

On the other hand, Mr. Smith has simply and honestly recognized an important political verity. Just because the man is unafraid to frame a legitimate political philosophy, does he necessarily deserve the reflex epithet of "racist"?

In his iteration of Montesquieu's aversion to the "tyranny of the majority," Mr. Smith only freely articulates what is, in fact, even in the United States given tacit expression. They may elect the proverbial dog-catcher and minor judges there, but the Federal Cabinet—the most influential body-politic in the land—is appointed: in terms of personal wealth and education, its composition is hardly typical of the average American elector.

Also, other apathy and political alienation are far and away a symptom of the less educated and the unpropertied, so that participation in the democratic process is disproportionately represented by an elite even in our vaunted "egalitarian" society. (After all, it is only sensible to expect that those to whom education has endowed a heightened awareness and to whom ownership of land has conferred a stake in the status quo are the ones who would naturally monopolize the electoral process.)

Even the founding fathers—and Jefferson in particular—would have empathized with Mr. Smith's dogmatism with the recognition of the place of elitism in leadership. These "revolutionaries" were, after all, gentlemen farmers and men of precocious intellect, and as such they determinedly strove to pattern the US Senate after the English House of Lords. Its prestige, the security of a six-year term would, they theorized, attract gentlemen very much like themselves, men whose eclecticism, whose judicial and prudent decision would restrain, would subtly influence the grandiloquent demagogues, the shabby adventurers, and the vulgar opportunists who would come to dominate the more populist "lower" house.

But while political scientists and historians may, with the gracious objectivity of academia, debate on

Mr. Smith's behalf, the fact remains that this sort of stand-be it one of principle or of patronage-is totally untenable. It is a stand that does not admit of even the slightest opportunity for compromise, painfully obvious as it is that black nationalists can never dignify it even by way of rebuttal. It is frankly baffling how Mr. Smith could-in good faith-come out with such a blatantly polarizing statement. It is the more frustrating when, as all must surely recognize, only a genuine spirit of accommodation and a willingness to make substantive concessions will be able to re-animate the bitterly deadlocked conference.

Yet Blacks are no less guilty than Mr. Smith. The theatrical posturing, the intransigent idealism, even the provocative language they favour are all intended primarily for the consumption of their followers at home. One frankly sympathizes with their plight and their aims. Yet one must also question their appalling lack of patience: after centuries of oppression, one wonders how a few months or even years can become so formidable an insurmountable obstruction to compromise. One questions their open avowal of distrust for the Smith regime. And one wonders how Blacks hope to successfully negotiate with the clever Prime Minister when their unity of purpose and their unanimity of philosophy are so lamentably unpersuasive.

The inherently antagonistic scheme of the conference, too, is a fundamental flaw. We are not witnessing Rhodesians convening in a spirit of good faith to decide the collective future of their country. Rather, the Blacks have chosen to ignore the realities of the past decade. Their strategy has been largely to snub the Smith delegation, appealing instead directly to Britain as the decolonizing power. This impels Mr. Smith to over-assert himself, and it traps a reluctant Britain into the dubious position of accepting responsibility without power. Neither responsibility without power. Neither result has been particularly conducive to the success of the conference. Nor can any negotiator legitimately claim to speak for the interests of the country as a whole. The mandate of each of the delegates is really quite unclear, and the diversity and mutual hostility of their constituencies reflect the factionalism that divides the country.

At this stage, then, my prognosis is essentially a pessimistic one. It appears highly doubtful that any enduring plan for an independent Rhodesia or any practical scheme of reconciliation will emerge from Geneva. Certainly, the commitment of both parties to this point in time, anyway, has been clearly lacking.

The prospect of any significant improvement is progressively worsening. If anything, the conference will, at its conclusion, have produced only a few tenuous results, and none of them positive. In the first place, it has given Black leaders the opportunity to experiment with a new militancy—and in so doing, to sample the all-important current of world opinion, it has enabled them to acquire an enhanced sense of confidence in the efficacy of their escalating guerrilla war of infiltration and attrition, and it has provided a convenient platform from which to proselytize, to gain prestige, and to jockey for prominence among the followers in their rival camps.

The second result will have been to buy Mr. Smith some valuable time, to allow him to consolidate his military and political positions somewhat, and to confirm his barely disguised contempt for the Black nationalists he has had to face across the conference table. No greater evidence for this is needed than his abrupt and premature return to Salisbury recently.

And Black militancy has only served to fuel the self-righteous sense of victimization on the part of the white minority, many of whom have even yet to be roused from their make-believe "head-in-the-sand" response to the brutal facts

Whether with reluctance, or with the self-satisfied vindication of a smug "I told you so," we must accept the immutable fact that the conference has failed. It has failed not only to achieve a peaceful and workable solution, it has failed not only to mollify belligerent Blacks, it has failed not only to render the Prime Minister's stand any more tractable; but, in fact, it has failed to establish even the most rudimentary consensus on long term goals.

It may actually have irreparably impaired those prospects for peace that Mr Kissinger so prematurely aroused only weeks ago. There remains precious little time for the participants to deflect the conference from its disastrous trajectory.

And as the momentum irresistibly mounts toward all-out war, a profoundly disturbing prospect is raised. For it will be a war that involves not only Rhodesia, not only Black Africa, but the competing strategic interests of China, the Soviet Union, and the United States, as well.

NSD apparently uninteresting

Dear Editor:

Previous experience should have prepared me, but I was still disappointed in the small number of participants in the various National Student Day activities.

Where were the crowds that wait patiently for a seat in the Pub or pack the Purple Reading Room and the Mac-Corry and Leonard cafeterias? Have they already grappled with questions such as what constitutes the "quality" of education, what they will acquire of real value from putting in 3 or 4 years at a university like Queen's or how equally accessible is educational opportunity? Have they already seriously considered the problems of student housing, tuition and academic grading? Perhaps, or maybe they were just too busy Tuesday afternoon.

What I can be certain of is that those students who attended the lively workshops and debates made some fundamental and essential enquiries. The various resource people and co-ordinators on campus should be commended and I look forward to reading their follow-up report.

Quebec election

Chance for self-appraisal

by Brian Green

Unlike the vast majority of nations—where bare survival is aspiration enough, where multi-nationals are not vilified but courted, where despotic, unstable regimes are by far the norm—we Canadians enjoy a rare freedom from economic worry and political oppression to indulge our singular, curious proclivity for introspection and self-appraisal. We debate shamelessly and with a seldom matched avidity about economic nationalism, we exercise ourselves furiously about our woefully inadequate identity, and argue petulantly about bilingual Corn Flakes boxes. We must surely be a most uniquely favoured people if such rarified dialogue is the stuff of our gravest national concerns.

There is, though, one such issue that perhaps does merit all of the posturing and bombast and political machination that surround it. This is the issue of separatism in Quebec, or, more broadly, of national unity. It is an issue that has assumed a new exigency of late, one that on November 16—may render all these other concerns largely irrelevant.

And yet—ironically—my distinct impression has been that the anglophone media have largely overlooked the potential consequences of the impending election in Quebec. I suppose that I should not find this indifference so particularly baffling. After all, the controversy is such a persistent one and the alarm so frequently sounded as to almost assure its relegation to some comfortable, obscure little warren in our collective conscious. And yet, I cannot escape the feeling that this time, things are different. Somewhere, deep down inside, this visceral sense of unease, of high-strung expectation, is nibbling away at my usually sober conservatism. Quebec, I fear, may be on the verge of shattering that whole painstaking, delicate jigsaw of national unity that we call Canada.

The Canadian version of federalism is certainly unique, and probably one of the most unlikely experiments in modern nationhood. John Macdonald was not only a consummate politician; with remarkable vision and a sure appraisal of the diversity that characterizes Canada, he fought tenaciously to usurp as much power as he could for the Federal cause.

Where the States in the union to our south had succeeded in jealously protecting their individual prerogatives and independence during their constitution-making one hundred years earlier, Macdonald perceived the danger of such a course for his future nation. In retrospect, the historical irony here is plain: where our federal system has seen more and more power devolve away from the central government and toward the provinces, our American counter-part has seen its slow concentration in Washington at the expense of the States. But even as our forms of government have superficially appeared to converge from the disparate intentions of their creators, the history of ours has doggedly pioneered its own erratic and often tortuous path, one that is particular to this country.

It is when viewed as the culmination of this heritage—the weird, intricate puzzle that locks all of Canada's jagged, brittle edges into an abrasive and improbable scheme—that the urgency of this particular election becomes so plainly manifest. From the Riel rebellion to the Manitoba Schools Issue to Bill 22, from the construction of a railway bisecting the western barrier of the Rockies to the construction of a barrier to western oil bisecting the Ottawa valley, from conscription crisis to War Measures Act, the ultimate, decisive confrontation has been inexorably building its momentum since even before Confederation was proclaimed. It is an emotional issue, chained to pride and encumbered by prejudice, and as such it stubbornly defies both prediction and prescription.

In pursuing the elusive concept that is Canada, many of our least promising politicians have vaulted to that rare stature accorded true statesmen. Others have launched the most cynical campaigns of self-serving opportunism behind the same aegis of patriotism. And between these two extremes, the mundane business of government, the grinding war of attrition for fiscal jurisdiction, have marked the daily course of federal-provincial relations. But on November 16, that persistent search for a chimerical sense of identity and unity may recede into history when Quebecers go to the polls. For in this election—more than ever before—the separatist option, the whole ugly language controversy, have most emphatically monopolized the turbulent pre-election debate.

Canadians outside of Quebec appear to be blissfully complacent about the upcoming confrontation there. Crises, apparently, have become commonplace, and the inflamed rhetoric on both sides has grown tedious. Many of us are no longer shocked by the prospect of a

"Canada" in which a Halifax-Toronto flight must gain clearance to cross foreign air-space. In some quarters, there is even a vaguely felt sense of relief: we've grown tired of the Quebecois' haughty, cryptic reply to our time-worn but well-intentioned query—"Just what does Quebec want?" In the Prairies, the pervasive feeling is not nearly so uncertain, and its expression not nearly so euphemistic. Prominent westerners have unabashedly articulated their barely disguised indifference to a separatist Quebec; some have heartily endorsed the notion. Indeed, in Canada's geographical heartland, disillusion and alienation with its own place in Confederation is rampant as well. Placed in this perspective, a PQ victory could very well ignite a slow-burning fuse that may eventually explode MacDonald's century-old vision.

It has been smouldering beneath the shallow camouflage of national unity ever since 1867, and the time-bomb may just be detonated at the upcoming constitutional talks. The practice of constituency representation—as opposed to the proportionate allocation of seats by popular vote—theoretically increases the likelihood of majority government. But with the multiplicity of parties running in Quebec, such a result appears very much in doubt. Bourassa's overwhelming majority of the last election was mandated him by an unprecedented 56 per cent majority in the popular vote. The most potent opposition came from Rene Levesque's Parti Quebecois, and in the two-party race that margin was sufficient to elect Liberals in nearly every riding. This time, though, a resurgent Union Nationale is running strongly. Its ambivalent stand on the divisive Bill 22—the central campaign issue—and its traditional free-enterprise platform could very well draw off enough of a protest vote to unseat the ruling Liberals. Rebellious anglois who suspect Bill 22, non-english immigrants who have been victimized by it, and conservative francophones who are frankly disillusioned by the taint of scandal that attaches to Bourassa and who are disenchanted with labour militancy could very well hand Levesque a minority government. The most likely alternative to a PQ victory is a Liberal-UN coalition—an unwieldy parliamentary alliance that would severely handicap Quebec's bargaining flexibility at the upcoming repatriation talks, and a painfully ironic ending to an election called ostensibly in order to arm Bourassa with a mandate to bargain strongly there on Quebec's behalf.

If we are to believe the dire predictions of Bryce Mackasey—whose sudden bolting of federal ranks to bolster Robert Bourassa's provincial Liberals is itself an ominous portent—optimism in Canada's future must be at its nadir. Bourassa's strategy may be best described as one almost of desperation. His slogan—"Your Only Guarantee"—is a blatant attempt to polarize opinion, a scare tactic intended to frighten wayward Liberals back into the fold. But it just may not be enough. Levesque is successfully down-playing the separatist issue (It is a monstrous irony that the roles of these two antagonist have become inverted so. While Bourassa stumps the province trumpeting the dangers of separatism, Levesque quietly stresses good management in government.) The promise of a referendum is reassuring many who see a vote for the PQ not as an endorsement of independence, but rather as a vote against the Liberals' smug monopoly on power. And Levesque—whose impressionable youth was spent in a predominantly Protestant, anglophone, home-town in the Gaspé—has always been a passionate believer in minority rights. Even some dissident english-speaking Quebecers may be sufficiently reassured by the man's obvious sincerity to give their votes to the PQ.

Prediction is always difficult, and particularly so when one is an outsider, when one's impressions are at best second-hand and one's views so easily glib in their objectivity. One may be certain, though, that a Liberal victory—whether in the form of a reduced majority or even as a repentant minority—is not the foregone conclusion that it has been in past races with the PQ. And one may be sure, too, that the pundits, the commentators, and the hangers-on will invest with tremendous significance any gain on the part of the PQ—and some improvement is a virtual certainty. At best, then, the election will serve a valuable function as a catalyst in re-focusing the straying attention of Canada on the separatist issue. Hopefully, too, it may galvanize us to address ourselves to some tough decisions and to face some unsavoury realities. At worst, the election might very well signal the end of that experiment in federalism we know of as Canada, and lay to rest one—at least—of those perennial, uniquely Canadian exercises in self-appraisal.

Cashing in on the peanut king of Plains

by Colin Brown

It can't even be found on a state road map. One must consult a mammoth publication entitled The Official Georgia State Bicentennial Directory which contains the name and location of every hamlet that has ever existed in the state, including those levelled by General Sherman, to locate Plains. There it sits, in the heart of Sumter County about 120 miles south of Atlanta, looking very small and inconspicuous.

A right turn off I-85 South onto Route 280 leads you on a lonely road which winds through the occasional town and across a flat expanse of tall pines, red clay, peanut and cotton plantations until you reach it. But don't blink.

To many in the more traditional echelons of American political power, it must seem that they indeed blinked—and when their eyes opened, an unknown Georgia Baptist peanut farmer was President-elect of the United States. People are still asking who Jimmy Carter is and they'll have plenty of time to find out. Eight years is a nice round number.

We visited Plains four days before James Earl Carter Jr. was elected to the presidency. It was a sunny Friday afternoon and the local folk were genial and relaxed. The town was enjoying its last breathing space before the deluge of media and spectators which was to arrive during the weekend. Upon walking into the train station we were greeted by a handful of elderly townspeople who wanted to shake hands and find out where we were from and, inevitably, comment on how cold it must be up there. There is a small souvenir shop in the station where one can buy Jimmy Carter peanuts, ashtrays, T-shirts, oil paintings, china and dish towels. There is also a bus tour of Plains to be taken. A charming southern lady takes the helm of a Volkswagen camper and calls out the town's historic sights where Jimmy was born, where he lived as a boy, his school, where Rosalyn lived, where they met, etcetera. And there is plenty of time to stop and take pictures.

The southern serenity and charm of Plains and its citizens helps one understand the character and conviction of Jimmy Carter. The religious pitch in his campaign was no bull—God is an essential element in these people's everyday life. Neither is a soft, gentle way of speaking with a more than occasional "friendly smile." It is their way of communicating, and Jimmy Carter was smart enough not to change it for a national campaign. But the impression that Plains is a tiny paradise cloistered away from the harshness of the outside world is misleading. Though they don't like to talk about it much, the people of Plains have seen more than their share of conflict.

Nine miles down the road from Plains there is a town named Americus, one of the ugliest centers of racial violence in the early sixties. The night the local police threw a young negro upstart named Martin Luther King Jr. in jail, the blacks almost burnt the whole town to the ground. Such confrontations could be ignored by no one in the district, and caused deep divisions among whites as well as blacks. Though the Carter family were far from activist by nature, they were labelled some of the county's first "nigger lovers"—a name people would shout at Carter's mother, Lillian, even when she campaigned for him in 1972.

Jimmy Carter is not a stereotype Southerner. It is easy for us to class him that way because a man with his convictions and background is very hard for us to identify with. His campaign pitch to the American people was identifiable though, as standard Democratic Party hype to get out the black, low-income and ethnic vote. To "clean up the mess in Washington." More jobs. More welfare. More programs for the under privileged and uneducated. Cut all the wasteful defense spending. Undoubtedly Jimmy Carter firmly believes in all these proposals, and sincerely wants to help America. The Democrats' sincerity in the election was most evident on election eve. To contrast with the Republicans, who gave Joe Garigiola sitting in Air Force One as it soared high above the clouds, the Democrats gave us Jimmy Carter in his study responding to pre-taped questions from "average" Americans. He replied to many challenges about the legitimacy and adequacy of his programs, like a magician pulling a rabbit out of his hat—one rabbit for each need. The only question they didn't ask him was where the money is going to come from.

And what of Gerald Ford? The greatest tragedy of all, far above that of losing as an incumbent, would be history remembering him as many still do, a bumbler who just couldn't cut the mustard. This man is clearly not, never has been nor ever will be. He is a good and decent man who took over the shattered remains of the United States Presidency and through his affable and unflattering character restored faith in the system. His chapter in history will be small but not empty—having held the highest office in the world unelected for two years, shot at by women, battling congress to keep the cost of government down, and fighting hard to keep his job. But that is not enough. One wonders if any Republican short of Abraham Lincoln would have won in 1976.

If the future of the Republican Party has never looked gloomier, the future of the Democrats has never looked rosier. The American people, though the election was a squeaker, have entrusted their nation entirely to the care of Democrats for the next few years. Perhaps in the next few months we will even see the Carter administration being looked on with some of the spirit of John Kennedy's "New Frontier" in 1960.

Meanwhile, back in Plains, life goes on. The townspeople know that their once unknown hamlet will be in the national spotlight for a long time. "Jimmy has done a lot for us," they all say. What next? Perhaps a hamburger stand. But Jimmy's brother Billy, who runs the local gas station, disagrees. When asked by a reporter on election night what he thought would happen to Plains now his brother was President, he replied, "Shoot I don't know. If ya ask me, the whole town's plumb gone 't hell already."

There are 683 souls presently living in Plains, Georgia. But that figure will go down by a few before it rises, no matter what sort of boom the town can expect. The Carters are moving to Washington.

Jesse Winchester and Good Bros.

Minimal sound folk and lush bluegrass

Jesse Winchester has been living in Canada for nine years now. He came here as a draft dodger and sometimes you can hear that in his music, though he might argue that Winchester told Street Life that "I can't help but feel that people read it into my songs because I'm lucky, or unlucky enough, to have a personal hook to my life like 'draft dodger'." Other people can sing about their childhood, but if I sing about Mississippi where I grew up, it takes on an added meaning because I can't go back there. Maybe it does to me too but I don't really think about it."

Winchester will be at Queen's this Sunday, November 14th at Grant Hall and he may be thinking more about home now that Jimmy Carter has won the election.

His style of writing could be described as 'minimal.' He can evoke in a few lines what others might make into a whole novelette, and some critics liken his songs to those of Stephen Foster. Winchester has grown up with music, both in Memphis and in Germany. He wanted to do newspaper work when he first came to Montreal but his French was poor, and he landed up as a member of a French-Canadian pop band and later an English speaking country band. A friend convinced the Band's Robbie Robertson to listen to one of Winchester's solo tapes and this resulted in Albert Grossman's management and his first album. The album contained some truly contemporary classics, such as "Yankee Lady," "Biloxi" and "The Brand New Tennessee Waltz."

One of Winchester's most recent bands in Canada included Butch McDade and Jeff Davis, both now Amazing Rhythm Aces.

Winchester admits to a flair for the unadorned, preferring "very simple chord changes and romantic themes." But it's a deceptive simplicity. His songs detail at a very elemental level the ebb and flow of life.

Vaghy string quartet

Last concert of term

The last concert of the 76-77 concert season by the Vaghy String Quartet will be on Wednesday, November 17 at 8:30 p.m. in Dunning Hall on University Avenue.

Three major works will be presented: Mozart's Quartet K 465, Paul Cawford's L'Etoile Nuit and Beethoven's Opus 74 string quartet.

Nicknames have often been applied to pieces of music. The Mozart quartet is known as the "dissonant" due to a particular chord that is prominently featured in the opening bars. The Beethoven quartet on the programme is known by the nickname of the "harp" quartet. This is due to the prominent pizzicato arpeggios played by the first violin in the first movement.

While historians have not been able to prove the fact, the first reading of the Mozart quartet probably took place in Mozart's house with Haydn playing first violin, Dittersdorf playing second violin, Wanhal on cello and Mozart himself on viola. Most illustrious musicians indeed!

Paul Crawford, a thirty year old Canadian composer, has written a number of chamber works but this will be the first time a piece of his has been performed in Kingston. Many Kingstonians will know him, though, having heard a number of music programmes that he has produced for CBC radio.

The Vaghy Quartet is currently in a very busy season. This past summer they taught music at the Kelso Music Camp near Oakville, Ontario, as well as participating in the Saskatchewan Summer School for the Arts. This January they return to Saskatchewan to tour a number of cities and towns with Gabrielle Lavigne, the noted Canadian mezzo-soprano. The Quartet will also appear with Mme Lavigne at St. Lawrence Centre in Toronto.

The quartet is continuing its programme of recording with the C.B.C. This month they will be recording the Franck quintet with pianist Antonin Kubalek.

Tickets for the November 17 concert, available from the Performing Arts Box Office, University Centre, Tel. 547-6194, are $2.50 general admission and $1.50 for students and senior citizens.

The Queen's Journal, Friday, November 12, 1976

The music called Western Swing could be described as a first cousin to bluegrass. At the same time that Bill Monroe was on the rise with his "Bluegrass Boys," including a young banjo picker named Earl Scruggs, Bob Wills and his Texas Playboys were pioneering a new sound in the southwest that was part bluegrass, party country and certainly part swing jazz.

The first Bob Wills Fiddle Band was founded in 1930 as a traditional country fiddle-banjo band. As Wills began experimenting with musical forms and instruments the band grew and changed. Ten years later The Texas Playboys were seventeen members strong, with a big horn section, drums and two early hollow body electric guitars, as well as the traditional instruments.

Wills' genius was in blending various musical styles into a sound that was danceable, popular and truly American. In more than 550 recordings his objective always remained the same: to play for dancing. Wills claimed that his greatest early influence was Bessie Smith, and the blues and jazz styles associated with her. He was also very fond of dixieland jazz.

It was by combining the blues and jazz styles he loved with the traditional fiddle music he grew up with that Wills has made his unique contribution to American music. He would take "an old song, rearrange it, and make it swing." It was the soul he added to his arrangements that liberated his Texas Playboys and let them explore areas that traditional country and folk musicians wouldn't dare touch. Leon McAuliffe, a great steel guitarist, said of Wills' fiddle, "it had feeling...It communicated with people...It had a mournful sound, yet it was real smooth. They all tried to imitate it, but there was never another fiddler like him."

Although he undoubtedly had a great effect on the evolution of country music Wills always argued that he never played country. Like that of Benny Goodman and Tommy Dorsey, his music was for dancing, to help people have fun and forget their problems.

In the early 1940's Wills added horns and strings to create seventeen and eighteen piece bands that were, against all the critics' predictions, very successful, and VERY swinging.

With the fifties, television and a rapidly changing culture, big dance bands lost much of their appeal and drawing power and slowly disbanded. Wills' new smaller groups were composed of strings mostly combining guitar, steel guitars, banjo and electrified mandolin to produce a fast full sound that is still extremely popular today in many variations, as performed by people like Commander Cody, Willie Nelson, David Bromberg, Asleep at the Wheel, Byron Berline and the Charlie Daniels Band.

This Saturday at 8:30 pm on CFRC 1490 AM, the bluegrass programme Shades of Blue will present a special feature on the music of Bob Wills. Featured will be both studio work and live recordings that range from the late thirties to the early sixties.

As much as Bob Wills was a pioneer of today's new country music he was an integral part of the jazz and swing era. What Duke Ellington was to New York and Chicago, Wills was to Tulsa and Phoenix. By bringing together a number of what might seem irreconcilable musical forms into one swinging sound that was fun and danceable, Wills has made a unique contribution to the evolution of American music.

The band at its biggest: Bob Wills and his Texas Playboys at Crystal City Park, Tulsa, in 1939.

Jefferys painted Canada before Group of Seven

An important travelling exhibition of landscapes by the English born Canadian painter and illustrator C. W. Jefferys is now open at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

The first exhibition of his work since 1952 (at the Art Gallery of Toronto), Charles William Jefferys 1869-1951 seeks to correct the critical imbalance which has placed undue stress on the innovative originality of the Group of Seven and its followers to the near neglect of its precursors. As these works by Jefferys will show, the contribution made by the forerunners to the Group of Seven to a national and independent Canadian art was a significant one.

C. W. Jefferys gained his fame not as a landscape painter but as an historical artist and illustrator. The illustrations he did for such publications as Pageant of America: Pictorial History (1925-29), Dramatic Episodes in Canada's History (1930), Canada's Past in Pictures (1934), and The Picture Gallery of Canadian History (1940-1950) as well as several large historical paintings and murals, established his reputation. But landscape painting and sketching was his first love. In his catalogue to this exhibition, Mr. Robert Stacey, the artist's grandson, points out that it was Jefferys' ambition to "apply to the depiction of pastoral and Wilderness Canada those same standards of fidelity to truth and attention to detail that mark his contributions to the visual and written history of his adopted country." The exhibition brings together 47 oils, watercolours and sketches inspired by what he considered to be his most influential teacher, the natural and immediate world around him. The exhibition continues to December 12th.

Volleyball teams see lots of action

by Dave Tod

Queen's Volleyball Gaels entered their second tournament of the season last weekend with optimism and enthusiasm. This was not enough however, to upset some of the polished, more experienced efforts of several university and club teams from around Ontario. Mental errors and a small number of fundamental mistakes led to inconsistency on the part of our squad. It should be noted though, that the team displayed a buoyant spirit and determined attitude that will enable them to battle their way to the top.

In the morning, Queen's was defeated by a vengeful University of Western Ontario group. The second match saw us lose a hard-fought decision to YMHA of Toronto. In the third and fourth encounters, Queen's split games against Orion Patch of Ottawa and Trois-Rivières. As the day wore on it was apparent that the Gaels had their work cut out for them for the remainder of the season. They consider last weekend not as a setback but rather a realization of what it will take to develop their fullest potential.

This weekend November 13, Queen's opens its regular season with an OUA league tournament across town at RMC. The Gaels play Ryerson at 10:00 a.m., U. of T. at 1:00 p.m. and Laurentian at 2:30 p.m. From talking with the players, we can expect to see some real fireworks happen against these squads. Coach Huddleston has been drilling his players hard all this week in preparation for Saturday. Fan support has been good of late and of course there is no greater impetus to a team's performance than when it has the vocal and moral support of the student body.

I might add also, that the Women's Volleyball Team did very well this past weekend, winning five of eight matches. Apart from their good looks there is some real talent amongst them

In summary, then, it is Queen's in league play at RMC this weekend. It promises to be good. If you can't be an athlete—be an athletic supporter. Don't miss it.
